

THE NATIONAL HISTORY OF FRANCE
EDITED BY FR. FUNCK BRENTANO
WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY J. E. C. BODLEY

Each Volume Demy 8vo Price 12s 6d net

- THE EARLIEST TIMES By FR. FUNCK BRENTANO
THE MIDDLE AGES By FR. FUNCK BRENTANO
THE CENTURY OF THE RENAISSANCE By L.
BATIFFOL
THE XVIITH CENTURY By JACQUES BOULENGER
THE XVIIITH CENTURY By CASIMER STRYIENSKI
THE FRENCH REVOLUTION By LOUIS MADELIN
THE CONSULATE AND THE EMPIRE By LOUIS
MADELIN (To be Published)

LONDON: WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD

THE NATIONAL HISTORY OF FRANCE

THE EARLIEST TIMES

BY

FR. FUNCK-BRENTANO

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH BY

E. F. BUCKLEY

LONDON
WILLIAM HEINEMANN LTD.

First published 1927

Printed in Great Britain by E. Clay & Sons, Ltd., Bungay, Suffolk

PREFACE

THIS volume contains the beginnings of French history from prehistoric times to the advent of the Capets. The works of our predecessors have been a great guide and help, above all the monumental work of Fustel de Coulanges on the institutions of Roman Gaul and the age of the Merovingians and the Carolingians, a work which is unique in its precision and wealth of information, its clarity of thought and its accuracy of expression. Worthy of the master is the great work of his disciple, Camille Jullian. The magnificent picture he has drawn of Celtic and Roman Gaul is arresting by reason of its varied and abundant knowledge, and perhaps even more on account of its brilliance of style and its happy boldness of thought. Gaulc Mérovingienne by Maurice Prou is a masterpiece. As for the marvellous Prolegomènes of Benjamin Guérard, praise is superfluous. And, as may well be imagined, the great works of Bayet, C. Pfister, A. Kleincausz, and G. Bloch, the accurate studies of Louis Halphen, the stirring religious history of Georges Goyau and the clear, strong pages of Imbart de la Tour have not been neglected.

At the end of each chapter will be found, not the bibliography of the subject, which would have overflowed the limits of this book, but an indication of the sources and the works to which we have been more particularly indebted, as well as such works the perusal of which would, in our opinion most successfully complete the pages which follow.

To our predecessors we owe much; we have delved wholeheartedly into their works, and we cordially acknowledge our indebtedness to them.

FR. F.-B.

CONTENTS

	CHAPTER I	PAGE
THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD	1
	CHAPTER II
CELTIC GAUL	27
	CHAPTER III
ROMAN GAUL	84
	CHAPTER IV
THE MEROVINGIANS	210
	CHAPTER V
THE CARLOVINGIANS	299

CHAPTER I

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

The territory of Gaul in the primary, secondary and tertiary era : the appearance of man. The divisions of the quaternary era. The quaternary era : the Chellean, Acheulean, Mousterian, Solutrean, Aurignacian, and Magdalenian epochs. The features of each of these epochs. The capital of the prehistoric period, the Eyzies in Dordogne. These six epochs make up the paleolithic, or the chipped stone age, succeeded after a long interval called the hiatus by the neolithic or the polished stone age. The palafittes or lake dwellings. The bronze age followed by the iron age which inaugurated the historic era.

THE territory to-day occupied by France, the boundaries of which have for centuries been unanimously considered to be the Rhine, the Alps, the Mediterranean, the Pyrenees and the Atlantic, has from the earliest times undergone certain transformations which geologists have made it their task to describe. This long period of Prehistoric Gaul formation has been divided by them into four epochs, each of which lasted several milleniums, and which they called the primary era, in which the continents first appeared and outside Europe a few chains of mountains were formed ; the secondary era, characterised by a great extension of the sea in southern Europe and the emergence of the northern regions out of the waters ; and the tertiary era when the waters once more covered the soil of Gaul, but when the central mountain mass stood out like an island, extending from the Morvan mountains in the north to the Montagne Noir and the Lacaune mountains in the south, and from west to east from the Limousin to the Cevennes. In the south, the Pyrenees reared their crests, and the Alps arose in the east. A second island then came to light—Brittany, to which were added the islands of Normandy, followed by a third, the Vosges. What we know as the Basin of Paris was a gulf the waters of which washed the shores of Brittany, the central body and the Vosges. Lastly, in the quaternary era the continents assumed the shape in which we know them, and man appeared.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As regards organic life, the primary era is characterised by the reign of the nautilites—mysterious submarine creatures composed of a head and four members, all the species of which are to-day extinct—and by the appearance of the batrachians; the vertebrates being represented only by fish and above all by numerous reptiles.

In the secondary era appeared the first form of mammalia—the marsupials, whose young were born as embryos which remained attached to the mother's breasts before they could live independently of her. These primitive mammalia came to light during the tertiary era, and at the same time the great saurians developed their monstrous forms—the dinosaurs, an order of reptiles, with skins either bare or covered by bony scales. Reptilian birds disported themselves in the luxuriant vegetation.

The tertiary era was glorified by a magnificent flora. It was the age of the great lakes, and the reign of the mammalia—the pachyderms, the ruminants and the great mammalian fish, the cetaceans. The first monkeys swung in the branches of the trees, and the proboscideans, mammals with trunks like that of the elephant, trampled down the wild vegetation surrounding the marshes.

Some scientists place man as early as the tertiary era, but it was in the quaternary that he appeared as the master of nature and her products.

J.-H. Rosny the elder, a novelist who, like Balzac, made more than one incursion into the domain of history, and, like him, illuminated it with flashes of genius, has given us a striking picture of the man of the quaternary era. Speaking of the man of over a hundred thousand years ago, he says:—

"Our ancestors of old used to light fires on the cold nights that were so full of terrors, when the fearsome machairoodus—The Hunters. (a meat-eating feline like the tiger) with its dagger-like canines was still hunting its prey in the same pastures as the mastodont, the tropical elephant, the tertiary rhinoceros, and the hipparion" (the ancestor of our horse, with three toes, of which the middle one was the largest. Julius Cæsar's horse, to which he raised a statue in front of the temple of Venus Genitrix, was an animal of this description, and examples of it existed in the nineteenth century—an extraordinary phenomenon of atavism).

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

"Man," continues J.-H. Rosny, "doubtless already showed well-marked variations—sometimes endowed with the strength of the gorilla and of a powerful build, sometimes weaker and more dependent on guile—in fact, combining the characteristics from which the thousand and one varieties of the present day have been developed, a feeble animal compared with the wild beasts which could have annihilated our tigers with one blow of their claws, and the herbivores of which the mammoth and the elephant are but the dwarfed descendants. It is with a shudder of pity that we picture to ourselves a small band of men on our French soil, during the flint age at Thenay." Thenay is a commune of Loir-et-Cher, where the Abbé Bourgeois found in 1865 flint chippings which led certain archæologists to place the advent of man in the tertiary era.

"The band of men would be encamped on the confines of a forest; or by a river, bordering a plain intersected by swamps. Wild animals abounded in the woods, in the high grasses and waters. Terrifying creatures had increased and multiplied. Herds of herbivores wandered about under the leadership of feroeious males. As yet no metaphysic of Good and Evil existed. . . . The universal destruction of the weak by the strong, of the stupid by the clever, of the solitary ones by the packs, went on without any reflection on the cruelty of natural laws. The beauty of the world was compounded of a colossal harmony of growth and murder, suffering and joy, love and hunting."

Man had not yet learnt the cultivation of cereals or of textile plants. He had not yet shut himself up in caves, or subterranean shelters; he lived in the open air, in the hollows of the valleys, in the depths of virgin forests, or else on the plateaux which stood out above the watersheds. On the heights from which may be seen the shining waters of the Somme, the Seine, and the Meuse, he made his first appearance in Gaul.

This was the period called by Camille Jullian "the age of the hunters," the longest of the stages in human development. It continued for tens of thousands of years and only ended a few millenniums before our own age. Man required this long period of time to rid Gaul of the monsters which swarmed there—wild felines, cave bears and the giant hyæna. And it was only after this fierce fight of centuries that, feeling himself master of the soil, he was able to set to work to cultivate it, to sow seed, and enjoy the fruits of his harvests.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The four eras, which we have just enumerated—the primary, the secondary, the tertiary and the quaternary—were in their turn subdivided into several epochs, identified by geologists according to "strata." We are only concerned with the quaternary epoch, in which man made his first appearance.

But perhaps the reader may wish to interrupt us. These successive eras, he may object, existed thousands and thousands of years before historic times, they have left no written records, no inscriptions; how then can we form any idea, however vague, of what could possibly have taken place in them?

To this our master, Fustel de Coulanges, would reply.—

"In the absence of books and inscriptions, there remains the earth's crust . . .", and he develops this idea with all the fine lucidity of his genius

"In Denmark," he says, "there exist huge deposits of peat. Peat consists of a mass of vegetable substances collected for centuries. Every square yard of peat represents several centuries of forests

"On digging, the various kinds of trees that made up this peat can be distinguished; the lowest layer is found to consist chiefly of pine; the layer above is oak, and the topmost layer is beech.

"Thus it becomes clear that in this territory the pine was for a series of centuries the chief feature of the forests, for another series of centuries it was the oak and for a third the beech.

"Now, with the succession of generations of trees and species of animals, generations of men and animals also succeeded each other in these ancient forests of which this peat is composed. The men who lived in them during the different epochs have left traces of their existence—instruments, weapons and utensils fashioned by hand. The men themselves have perished, but their works remain. And, just as the various layers of peat differ from one another and are composed of the remains of various varieties of trees, so these objects of human manufacture show different characteristics at various depths.

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

"In the lowest layer, the pine layer, all the objects which have served a human purpose are of stone. In the next layer above, the oak layer, objects and instruments made of metal already appear; this metal, however, is never iron but bronze. Only in the topmost layer do we find objects of iron."

Now turning to Gaul, let us examine, not only the superimposed beds of peat, but also the crust of earth which forms the soil of the country. The rocks we find there are also arranged in various superimposed strata. The alluvials, that is to say, those layers which have been formed in the course of centuries by the mud of rivers, which, though similar in formation to the peat left by the forests, have taken much longer to come into existence, are also superimposed in parallel strata.

If we dig into them we find the same deposits of all kinds as in the peat, that is to say, remains of plants, shells, bones, and the same objects of human manufacture which are once again seen lying in the same order—in the lowest stratum only objects of stone, higher up instruments of bronze and still higher up weapons, utensils and instruments of iron.

It is these things which make up the whole history. If, in the lowest, which is the oldest stratum, only stone objects are found, it means that in the age corresponding to this deposit man did not yet know the use of metals. After that comes bronze, an alloy of copper and tin, and we need not be surprised that this alloy should have preceded the use of iron, which is a pure metal. It is more difficult to extract iron from its ore than it is to mix tin and copper in the manufacture of bronze. For iron is harder to work whether by fire or forge.

The quaternary era has therefore been divided into the Chellean epoch (from Chelles in Seine-et-Marne), the Acheulean (from Saint-Acheul in the Somme), the Mousterian (from Moustier, a commune in Pyzac-en-Dordogne), the Solutrean (from Solutré in Saône-et-Loire), the Aurignacian (from Aurignac in the Haute-Garonne), the Magdalenian (from La Madeleine, a commune of Tursac, Dordogne), and a final epoch, which is the one preceding our own, called the Tourassion (from Tourasse in Haute-Garonne), to-day identified with the Azilian to be discussed later.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As no dates can be ascertained within thousands of years, and there are no historical landmarks, these epochs—or strata—have been named after the different localities, all situated in France, be it noted, where the various objects, consisting principally of weapons, have been discovered.

These six epochs, the Chellean, the Achulean, the Moustrian, the Solutrean, the Aurignacian and the Magdalenian, constitute the divisions of what is known as the palæolithic age—the early or chipped-stone age, in which the weapons used by man were made of flints roughly chipped into shape.

The Chellean epoch, which is the earliest of the chipped-stone age, and the first in which traces of man are indisputably found, is characterised by the primitive weapon, consisting of a sort of chipped stone axe in the shape of an olmond, which also served the purpose of a tool, a scroper or a knife. Men were scantily clad, the climate was very mild, and our ancestors rejoiced in a vigorous constitution. Supple, agile, and with long and flexible arms and legs, the Chellean was able to climb the giant trees of the period. In addition to his oxe-head of chipped flint, he was armed with a cudgel of wood and a spear. What was the quarry he hunted?—It consisted of the antelope, the deer, the elk, the reindeer, the horse, and the auroch, a sort of wild bull like the bison. But he had to exercise the greatest caution in order to avoid the huge monsters which would have swallowed him whole—the mastodons, the giant hippopotamus, the large felines, the cave bears and the woolly rhinoceros.

It is thought that Gaul was at this time joined to Great Britain by an isthmus, which was afterwards covered by the waters of the Channel. The climate was hot and damp, the vegetation tropical and the forests huge and dense.

Had the family yet come into existence?—In an embryonic form it probably had. Men had to join together in groups in order to defend themselves. As J.-H. Rosny remarks: "We can imagine the little clans, in which the supremacy of the cleverest hunter, the luckiest slayer of wild beasts, was recognised as a matter of course. The animal world was still too strong compared with man for the community not to bow before the necessity of acknowledging a strong and courageous chief."

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

The Chellean epoch was followed by the Acheulean and Moustierian epochs. The climate became colder and man found shelter in the caves and grottoes, among the most characteristic of which are the ones at Moustier, in the valley of the Vézère (Dordogne). This was the cave age par excellence, for the use of caves continued throughout the following epochs side by side with other kinds of habitation.

It has been pointed out that the troglodytes chose for their homes the caves in the proximity of running water. In Perigord, the classic territory of prehistoric man, the celebrated grottoes of Moustier, La Madeleine, Cro-Magnon, the Eyzies, the shelters at Murat, the grotto of Sainte-Eulalie, the Grotto of David, are to be found scattered along the Vézère, in Dordogne, the Drome and the Célé regions. The grotto of Chauffaut is on the Vienne, the Bruniquel caves on the Aveyron. On the lower reaches of the Vézère there may be seen, standing out along a stretch of twelve kilometres, a line of rocks hollowed out like a huge rabbit warren, which must have served as a shelter for a fairly large population. In other regions subterranean dwellings existed on the borders of the Loire and the Seine.

In the Moustierian grottoes weapons have been found which show a marked improvement on the clipped stone axe of the Chellean epoch—a lancehead, for instance, capable of inflicting a deep wound. Fastened to the end of a strong staff this must have been a most formidable weapon. The fashioning of flints had also improved. By a series of fine chippings a bevelled edge was cleverly produced on the axes.

In these caves the troglodytes must have lived a life more wretched perhaps than that of the free hunters of the Chellean epoch. We can only guess at the promiscuity of their sexual life. But their love of adornment is proved by the existence of shell necklaces, and earrings made of perforated teeth. Moreover, many of man's most formidable enemies had disappeared—the dinotherium, followed by the mastodont and the terrible machairodus. The lion still survived, together with the giant hyæna and the great cave bear, all of which demanded a share of his shelter and often tracked him down in it.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Free entry into the caves had not yet been barred.

"The human family used to light a fire to act as a barricade. All around, the animal creation, either hunting or being hunted, roared, howled, bellowed, trumpeted or bellowed. Some huge wild beast would pass by with his mate; he would roar at the flame, then crouch down and wait. Behind him came the hyenas, the wolves and other beasts of prey which lived on whatever the monster left behind him. If the fire burnt full and clear, and wood was not lacking to keep it up, all these savage beasts became restless and grew tired of waiting; but if the flame died down, if, for lack of feeding, cinders gradually took the place of the light, then the time had come for the Beast to cross the boundary. He would leap the space in great bounds of ten yards and the struggle would begin. When men were there in numbers, it ended in their favour. But if there were only six or seven of them, it was an indecisive battle; if there were but two or three, the disengaged pieces of the family which had been devoured remained for the prowlers and parasites" (J.-H. Rosny).

It is a remarkable fact that these caves of the primitive troglodytes were still inhabited down to quite recent times, in the Middle Ages and the seventeenth century. Several of them formed themselves into villages. In the glorious reign of the Roi Soleil (Louis XIV), Boileau, in his epistle to Lamoignon, described the subterranean village of Haute-Isle.

Le village au-dessus forme un amphithéâtre :
L'habitant ne connaît ni les chaux, ni le plâtre ;
Et dans le roc, qui cede et se coupe nisement,
Chacun sait de sa main creuser un logement.
La maison du seigneur, scule un peu plus ornée,
Se présente au dehors de murs environnée :
Le soleil, en naissant, la regarde d'abord
Et le mont la défend des outrages du nord. . . .

¹ The village above forms an amphitheatre; the dweller therein knows neither lime nor mortar; and in the rock, which is yielding and easily cut, he hews his dwelling with his hands. Only the house of the chief

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Many of these grottoes were still inhabited fifty years ago. The troglodytes are indeed tenacious folk !

The Mousterian epoch was followed by the Aurignacian (Aurignac, Haute-Garonne). It is remarkable for the first appearance in human history of any attempt at art; and an interesting branch of art it was, consisting of work on ivory. The female head from Brasempouy (Landes) with long hair curling on to the neck and shoulders, is a most precious relic; and then there were the mural decorations, such as the rhinoceros painted in red on the walls of the cave at Font-de-Gaume (Dordogne).

The Solutrian epoch followed (Saône-et-Loire). The climate was particularly dry. The seasons were clearly marked showing all the varieties between a cold winter and a fairly hot summer. Horses and reindeer abounded. At the foot of the precipitous rocks of Solutré a terrible accumulation of horses' skeletons has been discovered, amounting possibly to 100,000. It is supposed that the men of the period in hunting them used to pursue them to the edge of the precipice where the animals threw themselves over and were killed. At this time man seems to have eaten horse as well as reindeer flesh. Some vague beginnings of poetry may perhaps have existed. At all events, the art which, as we have seen, first saw the light of day among the Aurignacians, was brought to an astonishing stage of perfection during the Magdalenian epoch. But we must not forget how slow was the course of evolution, seeing that the Magdalenians are separated from us by thousands and thousands of years, and that they in their turn were divided from the Mousterians by an even greater length of time.

The Magdalenian epoch—how charming is its name!—is above all interesting on account of its artistic character. It took its name from the celebrated grotto of La Madeleine in Périgord on the Vézère, where Edouard Lartet, one of the pioneers of prehistoric research, found in 1864 that marvellous engraving on ivory representing with extraordinary accuracy of drawing the figure of a reindeer—a veritable work of art of over twenty thousand years ago. The animal is shown in profile, grazing, and its proportions, the naturalness of the position and the fidelity and precision of the outline are perfect.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

the giant hyæna and the great cave bear, all of which demanded a share of his shelter and often tracked him down in it

Free entry into the caves had not yet been barred

"The human family used to light a fire to act as a barricade All around, the animal creation, either hunting or being hunted, roared, howled, bellowed, trumpeted or bellowed Some huge wild beast would pass by with his mate, he would roar at the flame, then crouch down and wait Behind him came the hyænas, the wolves and other beasts of prey which lived on whatever the monster left behind him If the fire burnt full and clear, and wood was not lacking to keep it up, all these savage beasts became restless and grew tired of waiting, but if the flame died down, if, for lack of feeding, cinders gradually took the place of the light, then the time had come for the Beast to cross the boundary He would leap the space in great bounds of ten yards and the struggle would begin When men were there in numbers, it ended in their favour But if there were only six or seven of them, it was an indecisive battle, if there were but two or three, the discarded pieces of the family which had been devoured remained for the prowlers and parasites" (J-H Rosny)

It is a remarkable fact that these caves of the primitive troglodytes were still inhabited down to quite recent times, in the Middle Ages and the seventeenth century Several of them formed themselves into villages In the glorious reign of the Roi Soleil (Louis XIV), Boileau, in his epistle to Lamoignon, described the subterranean village of Haute Isle

Le village au dessus forme un amphithéâtre
L'habitant ne connaît ni les chaux, ni le plâtre,
Et dans le roc, qui éclate et se coupe aisément,
Chacun sait de sa main creuser un logement
La maison du seigneur, seule un peu plus ornée,
Se présente au dehors de murs environnés
Le soleil, en naissant, la regarde d'abord
Et le mont la défend des outrages du nord

¹ The village above forms an amphitheatre, the dweller therein knows neither lime nor mortar, and in the rock, which is yielding and easily cut, each man hollows out a dwelling with his hands Only the house of the chief is a little more ornate, and is built outside and surrounded by walls the rising sun looks first upon it, and the mountain shields it from the northern blasts

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Many of these grottoes were still inhabited fifty years ago. The troglodytes are indeed tenacious folk!

The Mousterian epoch was followed by the Aurignacian (Aurignac, Haute-Garonne). It is remarkable for the first appearance in human history of any attempt at art; and an interesting branch of art it was, consisting of work on ivory. The female head from Brasempouy (Landes) with long hair curling on to the neck and shoulders, is a most precious relic; and then there were the mural decorations, such as the rhinoceros painted in red on the walls of the cave at Font-de-Gaume (Dordogne).

The Solutrian epoch followed (Saône-et-Loire). The climate was particularly dry. The seasons were clearly marked showing all the varieties between a cold winter and a fairly hot summer. Horses and reindeer abounded. At the foot of the precipitous rocks of Solutré a terrible accumulation of horses' skeletons has been discovered, amounting possibly to 100,000. It is supposed that the men of the period in hunting them used to pursue them to the edge of the precipice where the animals threw themselves over and were killed. At this time man seems to have eaten horse as well as reindeer flesh. Some vague beginnings of poetry may perhaps have existed. At all events, the art which, as we have seen, first saw the light of day among the Aurignacians, was brought to an astonishing stage of perfection during the Magdalenian epoch. But we must not forget how slow was the course of evolution, seeing that the Magdalenians are separated from us by thousands and thousands of years, and that they in their turn were divided from the Mousterians by an even greater length of time.

The Magdalenian epoch—how charming is its name!—is above all interesting on account of its artistic character. It took its name from the celebrated grotto of La Madeleine in Périgord on the Vézère, where Edouard Lartet, one of the pioneers of prehistoric research, found in 1864 that marvellous engraving on ivory representing with extraordinary accuracy of drawing the figure of a reindeer—a veritable work of art of over twenty thousand years ago. The animal is shown in profile, grazing, and its proportions, the naturalness of the position and the fidelity and precision of the outline are perfect.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Engravings on ivory and reindeer bone are characteristic of the period, together with engravings on rocks, on scist, on stone and on pebbles. The first engraving on pebble was found in Lot, near Rocamadour, by the Abbé Lemozi. It represents a hind with her head turned licking herself. It is almost like a snap-shot, and even a photograph could not have reproduced the movement more accurately—a movement more complicated than in the case of the reindeer of La Madeleine which we have just been discussing.

Later still, in 1920, Abbé Lemozi discovered in the valley of the Célé—we are still in the department of Lot—a succession of grottoes divided into several large halls separated from one another by narrow corridors and galleries one of which is at least a hundred and fifty yards long. “The two last halls,” writes Jean Labadié, who visited them, “compose a veritable landscape with architectural details, an elysian stage scene which would have delighted the soul of Hubert Robert. A stone cascade ends in a flight of convex steps carefully rounded, from which a river of rose-coloured marble flows between amber-coloured bushes with branches more diverse than coral.”

The walls are decorated in black or red ochre, or else adorned with rock carvings, depicting all manner of prehistoric animals—mammoths, bisons, fish and equine creatures, the whole studded with hieroglyphic signs. The vault, eighteen or twenty feet above the ground, is covered with tracery and engravings. The arrangement of the place is reminiscent of a temple, and such it probably was.

These engravings carried out with flint chisels, these paintings in ochre or black—varied occasionally by sculptures like the astonishing bison in the cave at Tuc d’Audibert, so vigorously and accurately modelled in clay—almost always represent animals. The ideas of man, in the prime of his vigour and physical strength, are still the ideas of a child. You have but to watch children drawing; they always begin by drawing animals.

In this wealth of artistic expression—and it may well be described thus—the reindeer occupies the place of honour. This may be due to gratitude, amounting almost to a cult, to the animal to which the Magdalenian owed so much. The women, taking up their position at the door of the grotto, roasted reindeer joints over wood fires; as clothes for themselves and their families they sewed reindeer skins with the help of tendons and needles, the latter made of reindeer bone; the reindeer provided everything. And man, with respectful attention, engraved the image of the invaluable animal upon which his own life so much depended.

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

To the reindeer in these works of art were afterwards added the rhinoceros, the mammoth, the horse and the bison.

These drawings are astonishing, not only on account of the period in which they were produced, but by their intrinsic merit. In depicting animals in full gallop, the movement is reproduced with an accuracy which in the course of centuries the eye of man has become incapable of seizing. It needed the help of photography for Aimé Morot, who was the first to attempt such a thing, thirty years ago, to give an accurate picture of horses in full gallop in his famous charge of the cuirassiers. Fifteen or twenty thousand years ago, the Magdalenians noted these elusive running movements and fixed them for ever on stone; over two thousand years passed by before modern art found a method of retracing them by mechanical means. This proves that primitive man was far superior to us in strength and vigour of constitution and keenness of vision. And doubtless the same was true with regard to his sense of smell and hearing.

It is round about the small area of the Eyzies in Dordogne that the most interesting palæolithic settlements are grouped—the grottoes of Cro-Magnon, Laugerie, La Madeleine, Font-de-Gaume, Combarelles and the Cap Blanc shelter.

Here was the bright hearth of art found in the earliest beginnings of our history, tens of thousands of years before the oldest artistic productions left us by the most ancient civilisations. France may well be proud of having possessed it in the region which two thousand years later she was to call Périgord.

At La Madeleine a complete painter's outfit was found—a palette, paint pots and stones for grinding the colours. Only the perishable articles were lacking—the brushes. The study of these rock frescoes revealed seven different shades of ochre, the complete range from yellow to red and from red to brown.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Magdalenians produced their wonderful deep black from manganese salts.

So much has been found that a regular museum, the Louvre of prehistoric times, has been founded at the Eyzies, and this little place, which boasts of only a few hundred inhabitants, might be regarded as the capital of the troglodytes, the most ancient hearth of culture in the world. For, while it is true that other countries, such as Spain and Portugal, can produce prehistoric works similar to those of La Madelcine, nowhere else is such a large group of grottoes and decorated caves to be found, bearing witness to the activity of man's life in this district, to important reunions of hunters and nomads, and pilgrimages with possibly large assemblies of people meeting together at those seasons of the year consecrated to commemorative feasts.

Then one fine day our Magdalenians, who were hunters, artists and dreamers, saw appearing at the mouth of their valley unknown warriors armed with new weapons which dealt death from a distance. The reindeer became rarer, and migrated towards the north. Our artist-hunters followed it, preferring the rigours of life in arctic climes to bowing down before unknown masters. Whilst a few of them remained with the newcomers, to act as their slaves in the villages, the majority of them became Esquimos.

The Magdalenians, according to some archaeologists, were followed by the Tourassians (La Tourassc, Haute-Garonne) and this epoch was characterised by the use of spears made of deer's antlers.

This quaternary, or palæolithic, or chipped-stone age, divided, as we have seen, into six epochs, was followed by the prehistoric period properly so-called, which preceded modern times but is still many thousands of years earlier than the earliest of ancient history—that of Egypt in the most distant days.

This prehistoric period, in its turn divided into the neolithic age, or the age of polished stone, the bronze age and the iron age, was separated from the preceding era by an immense interval of time. Scientists, from an examination of the geological strata, have estimated that thousands of years must have elapsed before man replaced his chipped flint weapons by polished flint weapons; and to this abyss of time they have given the characteristic appellation of "hiatus."

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

But other learned men, whose minds were shocked by the idea of the hiatus, as the ears of poets are shocked by a hiatus in poetry, fill up the space between palæolithic and neolithic times by a period of transition, which they divide into three periods—the Azilian (the grotto of Maz-d'Azil, Ariège), the Tardenoisian (Fère-en-Tardenois, Aisne)—how pretty are these two names—and the Campignian—this reminds one of a quadrille—a period called after the village of Campigny in Eure, marking the advent of the neolithic age. The Azilian, Tardenoisian and Campignian epochs were apparently the product of a race of negroid type, probably from Africa, who marked a return to barbarism as compared with the preceding epochs. There are no longer any signs of art, or at most only rough schematic or geometric decorations on pebbles or walls; there are no more needles made of reindeer bone, no more assegais, no more beautiful spear-heads. The instruments, writes Abbé Breuil, are reduced to "picreers of split bone, clumsy polishers, flat, perforated spears, fashioned without art." According to Jean Brunhes, African influence may be detected in these minor products of industry which filled up the hiatus between the palæolithic and the neolithic ages. However that may be, the invention of stone polishing coincides with the end of the quaternary era and marks the first centuries of modern geological periods.

And, indeed, the neolithic age was destined to see great progress in another domain. What an advance in the manufacture of weapons, for instance! Let us take the axe alone, the polished flint axe, set on to the end of a strong wooden handle. Wielded by a vigorous arm, it doubled the power of the blow or the shock. With its sharp edge, the axe could make deep cuts or notches; with its blunt edge it could crush and bruise. Man was now in possession of a weapon which made him master of his rivals. But though material progress was great, it is maintained that, compared with the chipped-stone age, it was one of moral and social decadence. Artistic gifts gradually disappeared, and a period of long depression supervened which the following generations had great difficulty in overcoming.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The palæolithic, or ancient stone age (chipped stone), was therefore the cave age; the neolithic or new stone age (polished stone) was the age of the palafittes (lake dwellings).

The Lake-dwellers. During the winter of 1853 to 1854, the level of the Lake of Zurieh having lowered considerably, the discovery was made in the mud of an accumulation of stones, mixed with bones and carbonised objects, and fragments of weapons, utensils and pottery. The lake was dragged, and soundings were taken in the other Swiss lakes and the lakes of Savoy, where lake dwellings were found built on piles rising above the water.

For hundreds, possibly thousands of years, a large proportion of mankind lived on the waters. The lake villages must have been very numerous. The Lake of Neuchâtel alone possessed thirty. Man had not only to defend himself against the wild animals, but also against man, a far more formidable animal, since, in the lake period, the most dangerous beasts, the mammoth, the lion and the rhinoceros, had disappeared from the territory of Gaul.

The population had increased. The human being had secured for himself a certain amount of ease, a few commodities, and the beginnings of luxury, which was nevertheless, for the period, true luxury. He harvested cereals and flax, he ground his grain, made blackberry and raspberry wine, and wove his garments, for spinning had not as yet been invented. The needles were made of small bones of animals or fish bones. The lake-dweller possessed flocks and stored provisions. He knew how to make earthenware pottery, soon to be followed by chinaware and bronze swords. And then it was pleasant to rob one's neighbour of his goods, not to mention his wives and daughters, so charming when they were young, and their men who could be reduced to servitude..

While these lake dwellings certainly afforded safety, the patience and skill of neolithic man in constructing his palafittes with the help of stone implements alone completely baffle us. "This struggle for a habitation on the bosom of the waters," says J.-H. Rosny, "is assuredly the most grandiose in our evolution, and in contemplating it we are filled with feelings of poetic emotion."

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Men were grouped together in tribes. The houses composing the lake cities were huddled close together, and joined to the bank by a gangway on piles.

In the peat deposits of the canton of Lucerne wooden floors have been found which were at least forty yards long and twenty broad. They supported huts either round or square in shape. The woodwork consisted of interlaced branches of trees, covered by a roof made of reeds and rushes. The walls were composed of clay tiles baked by fire.

Round about the lake stretched fields of crops—corn and barley for food, flax for clothes. The live-stock included the bull of the peat-bogs, the goat, the goat-horned sheep, the marsh pig and—oh, marvellous to relate!—the dog to guard them, the dog whose alliance with man secured the victory of the latter over the other animals and his mastery of the earth. The horse had been domesticated. The bones of domestic animals have been found in the lake cities in far greater numbers than the bones of wild beasts.

Finally, in the palafittes of a later date, that is to say the bronze age, pieces of yellow amber have been found. Now this fossilised resin called yellow amber could only have come from the Baltic. Consequently the lake-dwellers of the bronze age must already have been engaged in commercial enterprises.

As J.-H. Rosny observes: "With his shelter on the face of the waters, the owner of cultivated fields and pastures, provisioned for the winter, fed by the fruits of the earth, the flesh of his cattle, and of the urus, the aurochs, the wild deer and the fresh-water fish, neolithic man must have enjoyed some very pleasurable moments when circumstances were favourable."

For the lake-dwellers used to preserve the wild fruits, nuts, chestnuts and dried apples and pears. They baked unleavened bread. "Cakes of coarse flour," says Jean Brunhes, "have been found, at least two thousand years older than the famous loaves baked at Pompeii." According to Camille Jullian, the population inhabiting one of these great lakes must have numbered as many as 100,000; they probably stored their provisions and goods on the lake, and sought refuge there in time of emergency, their ordinary dwellings being on the surrounding banks.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

They were places of refuge and shelter rather than regular dwellings.

Such at least they must have been in many districts up to the last centuries before our own era. Cæsar and Strabo both describe the Ardennes country where the tangled brushwood covered a far greater space than it does at present. This region was occupied by a population consisting of a mixture of Ligurians, Celts and Teutons. When threatened by an invasion of their enemies, these people barred the way into their country by interlacing the longer branches of the brushwood, mingled with brambles and thorns, strengthening the whole defence work with piles. They then retired with their families to the little islands in the middle of marshes, quite inaccessible to any army, says Cæsar, doubtless to the dwellings which had survived from the lake epoch and which they must have kept in repair.

Where no regular lakes existed, these houses on piles were erected in the middle of the marshes which were so numerous in those distant days. It is also possible that neolithic man hollowed out artificial lakes for the building of these edifices. The use of grottoes, moreover, had not been abandoned, and man made himself shelters of wood and leaves.

And it is now that we come across a proper name for the
The first time, the first proper name to be heard in the Ligurians. great silence of prehistoric ages—that of the Ligurians. It was first found in the writings of the Greek historians.

D'Arbois de Jubainville made a great historical discovery when he pointed out that the suffix ascus, asca is to be found neither in Latin nor in Umbrian, but that it must have belonged to the Ligurian language, a language which is also apparently of Indo-European origin. The Ligurians used the suffix ascus, asca when they wished to turn a word into the name of a place, just as we from the word chêne have made chênaie (La Chênaie), from hétre, hétraie, from saulé, saulair, etc. We find these terminations in asco, asca, aschi, usco, usta, osco, osca, not only in Upper Italy, in Ligurian proper, but also in

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Switzerland, in the valleys of the Rhine and the Danube and in northern Gaul. Now it is precisely in these regions that the lake dwellings are to be found and they belong to a period when the Ligurians were masters there. It is only in those districts, where the names of places bear these Ligurian suffixes, that the ancient lake cities have been discovered.

Whence it may be concluded that the lake civilisation was essentially a Ligurian civilisation.

It is true that these pleasing deductions are disputed to-day. Camille Jullian believes that the Ligurians and Celts spoke the same language, the Celts being a Ligurian tribe who founded a State on Ligurian territory.

In Gaul, the Ligurians occupied the entire basin of the Rhone. Some writers maintain that it was from here that they set out for the conquest of northern Italy, and later spread into the neighbouring regions of Gaul, the upper reaches of the basins of the Garonne and the Seine. Auguste Longnon even goes so far as to say that the name Thierache, the original form of which was Teorasea, proves that the territory of the Ligurians reached as far as the North Sea.

Thus we see that the lake dwellings coincide with the polished stone age and continued in use, after the comparatively short copper age, right into the bronze age. The latter began towards the middle of the third millennium (about 2500 B.C.) and ended towards the beginning of the ninth century B.C. But during this latter period a new style of habitation came into being which was destined to be characteristic of it—the underground dwelling. The ground was hollowed out more or less deeply in such a way as to form a shelter with vertical walls entered by means of a sloping path. The walls were then lined with wood in very much the same way as the trenches were in the Great War, or sometimes large stones were placed on the top of each other. A few stones composed the hearth, the smoke from which escaped through an opening in the roof. Inside were to be found seats and couches of stone, pieces of pottery, weapons and a few utensils in polished stone or bronze. Thus a regular system of cities grew up, uniting hundreds of these trench-like constructions which were built side by side, and in dimensions probably equalled the huts of the lake dwellings.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

time of emergency, their ordinary dwellings being on the surrounding banks.

They were places of refuge and shelter rather than regular dwellings.

Such at least they must have been in many districts up to the last centuries before our own era. Cæsar and Strabo both describe the Ardennes country where the tangled brushwood covered a far greater space than it does at present. This region was occupied by a population consisting of a mixture of Ligurians, Celts and Teutons. When threatened by an invasion of their enemies, these people barred the way into their country by interlacing the longer branches of the brushwood, mingled with brambles and thorns, strengthening the whole defence work with piles. They then retired with their families to the little islands in the middle of marshes, quite inaccessible to any army, says Cæsar, doubtless to the dwellings which had survived from the lake epoch and which they must have kept in repair.

Where no regular lakes existed, these houses on piles were erected in the middle of the marshes which were so numerous in those distant days. It is also possible that neolithic man hollowed out artificial lakes for the building of these edifices. The use of grottoes, moreover, had not been abandoned, and man made himself shelters of wood and leaves.

And it is now that we come across a proper name for the
The first time, the first proper name to be heard in the Ligurians. great silence of prehistoric ages—that of the Ligurians. It was first found in the writings of the Greek historians.

D'Arbois de Jubainville made a great historical discovery when he pointed out that the suffix aseus, asca is to be found neither in Latin nor in Umbrian, but that it must have belonged to the Ligurian language, a language which is also apparently of Indo-European origin. The Ligurians used the suffix ascus, asca when they wished to turn a word into the name of a place, just as we from the word chêne have made chênaie (La Chênaie), from hétre, hétraie, from saulc, saulaie, etc. We find these terminations in asco, asca, aschi, usco, usca, osca, not only in Upper Italy, in Liguria proper, but also in

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Switzerland, in the valleys of the Rhine and the Danube and in northern Gaul. Now it is precisely in these regions that the lake dwellings are to be found and they belong to a period when the Ligurians were masters there. It is only in those districts, where the names of places bear these Ligurian suffixes, that the ancient lake cities have been discovered.

Wherever it may be concluded that the lake civilisation was essentially a Ligurian civilisation.

It is true that these pleasing deductions are disputed to-day. Camille Jullian believes that the Ligurians and Celts spoke the same language, the Celts being a Ligurian tribe who founded a State on Ligurian territory.

In Gaul, the Ligurians occupied the entire basin of the Rhone. Some writers maintain that it was from here that they set out for the conquest of northern Italy, and later spread into the neighbouring regions of Gaul, the upper reaches of the basins of the Garonne and the Seine. Auguste Longnon even goes so far as to say that the name Thierache, the original form of which was Teorasea, proves that the territory of the Ligurians reached as far as the North Sea.

Thus we see that the lake dwellings coincide with the polished stone age and continued in use, after the comparatively short copper age, right into the bronze age. The latter began towards the middle of the third millennium (about 2500 B.C.) and ended towards the beginning of the ninth century B.C. But during this latter period a new style of habitation came into being which was destined to be characteristic of it—the underground dwelling. The ground was hollowed out more or less deeply in such a way as to form a shelter with vertical walls entered by means of a sloping path. The walls were then lined with wood in very much the same way as the trenches were in the Great War, or sometimes large stones were placed on the top of each other. A few stones composed the hearth, the smoke from which escaped through an opening in the roof. Inside were to be found seats and couches of stone, pieces of pottery, weapons and a few utensils in polished stone or bronze. Thus a regular system of cities grew up, uniting hundreds of these trench-like constructions which were built side by side, and in dimensions probably equalled the huts of the lake dwellings.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

One can imagine what these conglomerations of subterranean dwellings looked like when seen from a neighbouring height—merely a juxtaposition of roofs hardly rising above the level of the ground

Hard by the dwellings of the living were to be found those of the dead, the latter resembling grottoes, some of them natural, but most of them artificial. These have been found chiefly in the cretaceous subsoil of Champagne. The skeletons in them were arranged with their heads turned to the walls, and were divided from each other by flat stones. About them were placed the weapons, the utensils, the ornaments and other reliques of the deceased. Beside the corpse dishes were placed filled with food for its sustenance, in keeping with the oldest beliefs of southern Europe, so well described by Fustel de Coulanges in his Cité Antique. The burial grotto was generally approached through a smaller grotto, forming a sort of vestibule or peristyle, entered by a corridor the ground of which had clearly been much trampled under foot by visitors—doubtless parents, friends and devotees coming to render pious homage to the departed and bring them offerings.

More numerous and more interesting than the monuments to the dead hollowed out in the grottoes were those which appeared above ground, often constructed in imposing dimensions—the dolmens, the menhirs and the cromlechs. These have often been regarded as Druidical monuments, but some of the most important of them have been found in districts which the Druids never inhabited. The megaliths are of far earlier date than the Celts and the Druids.

Like the polished stone age and contemporary with it, the period which witnessed their construction was called after these monuments of huge unhewn stone—it was known as the megalithic age (from the Greek words μέγας, large, and λίθος, stone).

Monuments similar to the dolmens and menhirs are to be found in Algeria and Syria, as well as in India and Japan, but they are most numerous on French soil. Dechelette estimates them at 4458.

The dolmens, made of huge stones placed side by side and on top of one another, were monuments to the dead. The whole construction was covered with earth on which the grass grew. Viewed from a distance on a plain a dolmen looked like a kind of knoll or bank, in the shape of a great long tortoise with a turf-covered shell. From most of the dolmens the hand of time has removed the earth and sand, leaving behind only the granite skeleton.

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

Some of these blocks of stone, such as the great menhir of Men-er-Hroëek (The Fairy Stone), weigh at least 200 tons; l'Aiguille de Locmariaque weighs 347 tons. In order to place these granite columns where they stand, they had to be moved over twelve to eighteen miles.

Were the men who handled these cyclopean blocks giants then? we exclaim. Not a bit of it. They were small, puny men whose acquaintance we made in discussing the lake dwellings.

And ancient writers, as a matter of fact, tell us that the Ligurians were a dark-haired race of short stature, extraordinarily robust and endowed with great energy. Diodorus and Strabo describe them as small but possessing muscles of incredible elasticity. The Ligurian, who was an indefatigable runner, looked as though he were set on steel springs. His limbs seemed to obey the orders of his will without ever tiring. In running the light-footed Ligurian knew no rival. The Mediterranean people used to speak colloquially of the swift Ligurian, just as we speak of the light-footed gazelle or the agile squirrel. Æschylus praised his stamina.

The Ligurian was deeply attached to the soil, which he tilled with stubborn perseverance. Even the women worked on the land with unremitting diligence. In our own days we may still see the Arab women in Algeria going out to wash clothes in the neighbouring streams just before they are expecting the birth of a child, so that, sometimes, the little boy or girl arrives in the middle of the washing operations. And then, when the sun has gone down below the horizon, the mother returns to the hut, bearing on her head the palm fibre basket full of the clothes she has washed in the river and on the top of it the new-born baby. The Ligurian woman of ancient days resembled her. She would interrupt her hard work on the land to give birth to her child, which she washed in a neighbouring stream.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Then placing it in some safe place she would return to her digging and weeding as if nothing had happened, and in the evening go home with her baby in her arms.

This physical vigour was not accompanied by any sign of artistic gifts, however feeble. "The best drawings produced by megalithic man," says Camille Jullian, "were the geometric figures with which they adorned their pottery, which, however, were in no way different from or superior to what may be found among the least intelligent of savage races." They had no idea of literature. The women could tell no tales, and the old men no legends, unless it were to call to mind the stratagems which the Ligurians were so clever at devising, the ambuscades which no one knew how to arrange and carry out so well as they did. Nevertheless, even among the Ligurians, there existed some dim remembrance of that mysterious Kingdom of Ys, lost in the shadowy and distant past of the country of the menhirs, probably swallowed up by the waters, a legend common to the folk-lore of all races.

The religion of the Ligurians consisted, like that of many other primitive people, in a simple and straightforward worship of natural elements. Fire, Earth, the Sun, the Moon, the Evening Star, the Morning Star, were for them divinities who were sometimes evilly and sometimes well disposed towards them. Above all they worshipped the Earth in the form of a goddess, and on a lower and more limited scale local divinities, such as springs, lakes, trees and hills, which were haunted by their familiar spirits, fauns, sylvans, hamadryads, nymphs and naiads, elves and fairies. . . .

These were primitive, deep-rooted traditions. As late as the fourteenth century the girl friends of Joan of Arc used to seek for cures at the fountain of the currant bushes, over which a local divinity had cast its spell. Joan used to join the pretty processions which, on mysterious anniversaries, used to go and hang garlands on the fairies' tree; she would be one among the train of people who went to sing hymns under the tall trees on Ascension Eve. The priests and monks of Rouen were not far wrong when they accused the marvellous maid of worshipping the last survivors of their rival divinities, to whom, all unconsciously, like the true daughter of the soil of France that she was, Joan had in her earliest childhood rendered this simple homage, not knowing it was the tradition of far distant ancestors.

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

The religion of the Ligurians, like that of the early Greeks, demanded human sacrifices. Until the beginning of the first century before our own era, the Ligurians of the Apennines sacrificed prisoners taken on the field of battle to their gods, until some new divinity, introduced into their Pantheon of nature-gods, taught them that it was more advantageous to sell their prisoners to the Greeks as slaves than to cut their throats on the altar-stones.

The erection of these megalithic monuments required the help of hundreds and hundreds of men all working together. Thus the dolmens and the menhirs presuppose the existence of an organised society divided into classes under the rule of a guiding aristocracy. Moreover, only the leaders of a strong aristocracy could have been honoured by funeral monuments of such dignified proportions.

Many bodies were buried in the same dolmen, which often resembled an ossuary, a magnificent family vault, in which generation succeeded generation.

In the districts where the dolmens were also to be found, dating from the same period, huge stones pointing skyward and fixed in the ground by their most pointed end. They were generally arranged in lines. These are the famous menhirs. If they were arranged in semi-circles they were called "cromlechs."

All kinds of wild hypotheses have been advanced to explain the meaning of the menhirs and the cromlechs, the most probable being that they were connected with the cult of the dead. The menhirs may have been funeral piles. Of the innumerable theories advanced on the subject of the rows of stones at Carnac in Brittany, "I prefer," says Camille Jullian, "that which explains it as a colossal funeral ground of primitive times, whence the dead after being burnt and stripped of their flesh, departed for their new abode."

The neolithic and megalithic age has been called by Jullian the epoch of the agriculturists. Social life had been established on a firm basis. The pursuit of comfort had developed human activity. Wheat was sown and harvested and bread was brought forth from the oven; for it is a remarkable fact that, of all cultivated grain, wheat was the first to crown the labours of man, and was followed by millet, barley, rye and oats. Fruit trees were picked out in the wild woods, selected and cultivated, particularly the pear and the apple tree; flax was gathered, to be followed later by hemp.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And the first efforts at industry had already yielded valuable results. In the lake villages weavers' combs, cords, thread and pieces of stuff have been found. Soon the wool was taken from the sheepskins and supplemented the rough furs of bygone ages with warm materials. Later on man learnt to dye them blue and red with woad and kermes. The art of pottery, with its utensils of various shapes, preceded the bronze age which ushered out the neolithic epoch. We have already discussed the bronze age in describing the last years of the lake period.

The bronze age coincides roughly with the period called by Camille Jullian the age of the migrations. The great migrations began no doubt before the end of the neolithic age, and the epoch of the warriors may have begun before the close of the bronze age.

The migrations proceeded from two main sources, one hailing from the Far East and the mysterious East Indies, the other from the north and snowlad Scandinavia. Now these migrations did not take the form of sudden huge overflows spreading over vast tracts like some impetuous flood. On the contrary, they were gradual advances, slow movements towards the west, or towards the south, on the part of races who, without any desire for war or plunder, were seeking less densely populated and more fertile districts, with a milder climate, but were often driven to acts of violence by the resistance they encountered or by despair of ever reaching the goal which seemed constantly to elude them. Tens, possibly hundreds of years, must have been spent by the Indo-Europeans and the Hyperboreans in their gradual conquest of Europe.

The bronze age is itself divided into the Morges period (from Morges in the canton of Vaud in Switzerland), when hatchets, daggers and swords made of bronze still showed very rough workmanship; and the Larnaud period (from Larnaud in Jura), which was also called "the fine age of bronze."

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

As a protection against these migrations walls and fortresses were built, some of them composed of the huge blocks of the megalithic period, like the formidable wall at Sainte-Odile made of giant stones, placed side by side, and joined by wooden bolts in the shape of a swallow tail—"dove-tailed" as we call it. In the course of time the wood rotted away, and only the cavity into which it had been fixed in the stone remained. When the difficulty of building a stone wall seemed too great, a substitute was found in the shape of ramparts of heaped earth.

Men succeeded in combining together for collective work. Marshes spreading over thousands of acres were drained, such, for instance, as those in Alimania, a colossal enterprise demanding all the more trouble and energy, and all the greater co-operation and organising power, seeing that man was still very poorly equipped with instruments for his task.

And this co-operation in enterprise, which meant that thousands and thousands of men had to work harmoniously together, bears witness to the high degree of social understanding and moral culture reached by man, not to mention some system of common legislation which inspired respect.

Moreover, as J.-H. Rosny has so clearly pointed out, the presence of civilising elements was due, not to the immigrants, but to the autochthonous races. The invaders found themselves in a small minority compared with the races which for centuries had been installed in the great oak or chestnut forests, on the cultivated plateaus or in the hollows of the verdant valleys.

They were no longer met by people who took refuge underground, but by a race who lived in dwellings built above ground and already possessed of many an object that tended to add to the amenities of life.

But is not this the invariable rule? In ancient times invasion meant the overrunning of a conquered people by a race lower in the scale of culture: Græcia capta ferum victorem cepit was an oft repeated phenomenon. What the Goths were to the Romans, the Germans to the Gallo-Romans, the Indo-Europeans and the Hyperboreans were to the natives whom they found in Gaul.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The large number of fortifications which made their appearance towards the end of the bronze age proves how greatly man lived in fear of man. Surprise attacks, sudden sallies, and war-like expeditions became frequent. And lo! we enter into the iron age which Julian calls the epoch of the warriors.

We are now on the confines of the historical period which we shall make it our task to describe. Already the name of

The one race has been mentioned—the Ligurians, to Iberians. Be followed now by the Iberians. It is true that, with regard to the latter, historians are not agreed.

“Iberian” apparently was the name, not of a race, but of a State, the Empire of the Ebro, a name used by the Greeks for this district. At the beginning of the fifth century (500–475 B.C.) the Kingdom of the Iberians, stretching beyond the Pyrenees, may have extended into Languedoc as far as the Rhone. Bordeaux thus becomes Iberian. Euskarien, that is to say the Basque language, which, as we know, has survived with such wonderful tenacity in the mountain districts, must have been the language of the Iberians. Basque itself was probably composed of two elements, the one Iberian, possibly of Asiatic origin, the other Italo-Celtic. This much at least is certain, that the peninsula of Spain owes its name—Iberia—to the Iberians, a name of Greek origin, and that, in the first century before our era, a branch of these Iberians, called Aquitanians, occupied the region stretching between the Pyrenees and the Garonne, where Caesar’s soldiers came across them. But in the East civilisation had already adopted pulsating forms of life; Egypt bore witness to a magnificent culture; Greece was listening to the lays of Homer and was soon to produce works of art of the highest beauty, whilst the dawn of Roman greatness was already visible. In Gaul the iron age was inaugurated, which was also divided into two “stages.” The first (from the eleventh to the fifth century B.C.) was called the Hallstatt period (from Hallstatt, a place in the Salzburg mountains in Austria)—a huge necropolis where, in hundreds of tombs, weapons, utensils and bronze and iron ornaments were found. The sword was still made of bronze. The iron sword made its first appearance in the iron age (the end of the second century B.C.) called the La Tène period

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

(from La Tène, a place on the lake of Neuchâtel, which became famous). With the La Tène period we enter into the domain of history. The skeletons found at Hallstatt and La Tène are supposed to be Celtic. Armed with the sword of La Tène the Celts, who were natives of the Danish isles and peninsula, and the lower plains of northern Germany, invaded Gaul in the fifth century before our era, conquered the Ligurians there, overran Europe as fiery victors, and founded an Empire in Asia Minor; with the iron sword of La Tène the Gauls of Vercingetorix were destined to be armed beneath the walls of Alesia.

To sum up, we have seen that a number of diverse races succeeded each other on the soil of France, beginning with palaeolithic man, who was possibly not autochthonous, followed first by the Indo-Europeans and Scandinavians, and then by the Iberians, the Ligurians and the Celts. Next in succession came the Romans by right of conquest, the Goths and the Germans by invasion, the Syrians and the Semites by a process of infiltration, the Hungarians and the Saracens as robbers, and the Normans as robbers and afterwards as colonisers.

Like the soil on which it came into being, the French people, too developed in race, in manners and in language, after the manner of alluvial deposits—the chief of these alone amount to a dozen—divers elements, each one of which contributed its share to all that is most striking, most original, brightest and strongest, in that magnificent whole, which centuries of social life, co-ordinated efforts, hopes and fears shared in common, and struggles endured side by side, have mingled into one incomparable alloy—the nation, the language and the civilisation of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Legrand d'Aussy. Mém. sur les anciennes sépultures nationales, from Mém. de l'Institut, Sciences Morales. Élie de Beaumont, Recherches sur quelques unes des révolutions de la surface du globe, 1829–30. John Lubbock, Prehistoric Man, 1889. Ém. Cartailhac, La France préhistorique, 1889. Alex. Bertrand, La Gaule avant les Gaulois, 1891, 2nd ed. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Les Premiers Habitants de l'Europe, 1894, 2nd ed. J. Flach, Origine de l'habitation et des lieux habités en France, 1899. Gabriel and Adrien de Mortillet, Le Préhistorique, 1900, 3rd ed. G. Bloch, La Gaule indépendante . . . from Hist. de France, published by E. Lavis, 1901. Peyrony, Les Eyzies et les environs, 1903. Joseph Déchelette,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The large number of fortifications which made their appearance towards the end of the bronze age proves how greatly man lived in fear of man. Surprise attacks, sudden sallies, and war-like expeditions became frequent. And lo! we enter into the iron age which Julian calls the epoch of the warriors.

We are now on the confines of the historical period which we shall make it our task to describe. Already the name of

The one race has been mentioned—the Ligurians, to Iberians. Be followed now by the Iberians. It is true that, with regard to the latter, historians are not agreed.

"Iberian" apparently was the name, not of a race, but of a State, the Empire of the Ebro, a name used by the Greeks for this district. At the beginning of the fifth century (500-475 B.C.) the Kingdom of the Iberians, stretching beyond the Pyrenees, may have extended into Languedoc as far as the Rhone. Bordeaux thus becomes Iberian. Euskarien, that is to say the Basque language, which, as we know, has survived with such wonderful tenacity in the mountain districts, must have been the language of the Iberians. Basque itself was probably composed of two elements, the one Iberian, possibly of Asiatic origin, the other Italo-Celtic. This much at least is certain, that the peninsula of Spain owes its name—Iberia—to the Iberians, a name of Greek origin, and that, in the first century before our era, a branch of these Iberians, called Aquitanians, occupied the region stretching between the Pyrenees and the Garonne, where Caesar's soldiers came across them. But in the East civilisation had already adopted pulsating forms of life; Egypt bore witness to a magnificent culture; Greece was listening to the lays of Homer and was soon to produce works of art of the highest beauty; whilst the dawn of Roman greatness was already visible. In Gaul the iron age was inaugurated, which was also divided into two "stages." The first (from the eleventh to the fifth century B.C.) was called the Hallstatt period (from Hallstatt, a place in the Salzburg mountains in Austria)—a huge necropolis where, in hundreds of tombs, weapons, utensils and bronze and iron ornaments were found. The sword was still made of bronze. The iron sword made its first appearance in the iron age (the end of the second century B.C.) called the La Tène period

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

(from La Tène, a place on the lake of Neuchatel, which became famous). With the La Tène period we enter into the domain of history. The skeletons found at Hallstatt and La Tène are supposed to be Celtic. Armed with the sword of La Tène the Celts, who were natives of the Danish isles and peninsula, and the lower plains of northern Germany, invaded Gaul in the fifth century before our era, conquered the Ligurians there, overran Europe as fiery victors, and founded an Empire in Asia Minor; with the iron sword of La Tène the Gauls of Vercingetorix were destined to be armed beneath the walls of Alesia.

To sum up, we have seen that a number of diverse races succeeded each other on the soil of France, beginning with palaeolithic man, who was possibly not autochthonous, followed first by the Indo-Europeans and Scandinavians, and then by the Iberians, the Ligurians and the Celts. Next in succession came the Romans by right of conquest, the Goths and the Germans by invasion, the Syrians and the Semites by a process of infiltration, the Hungarians and the Saracens as robbers, and the Normans as robbers and afterwards as colonisers.

Like the soil on which it came into being, the French people, too developed in race, in manners and in language, after the manner of alluvial deposits—the chief of these alone amount to a dozen—divers elements, each one of which contributed its share to all that is most striking, most original, brightest and strongest, in that magnificent whole, which centuries of social life, co-ordinated efforts, hopes and fears shared in common, and struggles endured side by side, have mingled into one incomparable alloy—the nation, the language and the civilisation of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Legrand d'Aussy. Mém. sur les anciennes sépultures nationales, from Mém. de l'Institut, Sciences Morales. Élie de Beaumont, Recherches sur quelques unes des révolutions de la surface du globe, 1829–30. John Lubbock, Prehistoric Man, 1889. Ém. Cartailhac, La France préhistorique, 1889. Alex. Bertrand, La Gaule avant les Gaulois, 1891, 2nd ed. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Les Premiers Habitants de l'Europe, 1894, 2nd ed. J. Flaubert, Origine de l'habitation et des lieux habités en France, 1899. Gabriel and Adrien de Mortillet, Le Préhistorique, 1900, 3rd ed. G. Bloch, La Gaule indépendante . . . from Hist. de France, published by E. Lavisson, 1901. Peyrony, Les Eyzies et les environs, 1903. Joseph Déchelette,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The large number of fortifications which made their appearance towards the end of the bronze age proves how greatly man lived in fear of man. Surprise attacks, sudden sallies, and war-like expeditions became frequent. And lo! we enter into the iron age which Julian calls the epoch of the warriors.

We are now on the confines of the historical period which we shall make it our task to describe. Already the name of

The one race has been mentioned—the Ligurians, to Iberians. Be followed now by the Iberians. It is true that, with regard to the latter, historians are not agreed.

“Iberian” apparently was the name, not of a race, but of a State, the Empire of the Ebro, a name used by the Greeks for this district. At the beginning of the fifth century (500-475 B.C.) the Kingdom of the Iberians, stretching beyond the Pyrenees, may have extended into Languedoc as far as the Rhone. Bordeaux thus becomes Iberian. Euskarien, that is to say the Basque language, which, as we know, has survived with such wonderful tenacity in the mountain districts, must have been the language of the Iberians. Basque itself was probably composed of two elements, the one Iberian, possibly of Asiatic origin, the other Italo-Celtic. This much at least is certain, that the peninsula of Spain owes its name—Iberia—to the Iberians, a name of Greek origin, and that, in the first century before our era, a branch of these Iberians, called Aquitanians, occupied the region stretching between the Pyrenees and the Garonne, where Caesar’s soldiers came across them. But in the East civilisation had already adopted pulsating forms of life; Egypt bore witness to a magnificent culture; Greece was listening to the lays of Homer and was soon to produce works of art of the highest beauty, whilst the dawn of Roman greatness was already visible. In Gaul the iron age was inaugurated, which was also divided into two “stages.” The first (from the eleventh to the fifth century B.C.) was called the Hallstatt period (from Hallstatt, a place in the Salzburg mountains in Austria)—a huge necropolis where, in hundreds of tombs, weapons, utensils and bronze and iron ornaments were found. The sword was still made of bronze. The iron sword made its first appearance in the iron age (the end of the second century B.C.) called the La Tène period

THE PREHISTORIC PERIOD

(from La Tène, a place on the lake of Neuchâtel, which became famous). With the La Tène period we enter into the domain of history. The skeletons found at Hallstatt and La Tène are supposed to be Celtic. Armed with the sword of La Tène the Celts, who were natives of the Danish isles and peninsula, and the lower plains of northern Germany, invaded Gaul in the fifth century before our era, conquered the Ligurians there, overran Europe as fiery victors, and founded an Empire in Asia Minor; with the iron sword of La Tène the Gauls of Vercingetorix were destined to be armed beneath the walls of Alesia.

To sum up, we have seen that a number of diverse races succeeded each other on the soil of France, beginning with palaeolithic man, who was possibly not autochthonous, followed first by the Indo-Europeans and Scandinavians, and then by the Iberians, the Ligurians and the Celts. Next in succession came the Romans by right of conquest, the Goths and the Germans by invasion, the Syrians and the Semites by a process of infiltration, the Hungarians and the Saracens as robbers, and the Normans as robbers and afterwards as colonisers.

Like the soil on which it came into being, the French people, too developed in race, in manners and in language, after the manner of alluvial deposits—the chief of these alone amount to a dozen—divers elements, each one of which contributed its share to all that is most striking, most original, brightest and strongest, in that magnificent whole, which centuries of social life, co-ordinated efforts, hopes and fears shared in common, and struggles endured side by side, have mingled into one incomparable alloy—the nation, the language and the civilisation of France.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Le Grand d'Aussy. Mém. sur les anciennes sépultures nationales, from Mém. de l'Institut, Sciences Morales. Élie de Beaumont, Recherches sur quelques unes des révolutions de la surface du globe, 1829–30. John Lubbock, Prehistoric Man, 1889. Ém. Cartailhac, La France préhistorique, 1889. Alex. Bertrand, La Gaule avant les Gaulois, 1891, 2nd ed. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Les Premiers Habitants de l'Europe, 1894, 2nd ed. J. Flach, Origine de l'habitation et des lieux habités en France, 1899. Gabriel and Adrien de Mortillet, Le Préhistorique, 1900, 3rd ed. G. Bloch, La Gaule indépendante . . . from Hist. de France, published by E. Lavisse, 1901. Peyrony, Les Eyzies et les environs, 1903. Joseph Déchelette, intermediate Teutonic form Walah, came to be applied to the Wallachians, the Walloons, to the Gauls, and to those Gauls, whom the Germans were afterwards to call by a name which on their lips became a word of abuse, and was also derived from Walah—the Welsh.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Whilst the Ligurians had been a short, dark-haired, olive-skinned race, the Celts were tall and fair, with pink and white skins. The fair-haired Celts, writes Claudian, “proud of their tall stature, despised the shortness of the Romans” (Julius Caesar). They must have resembled the Slavs more than they did the ancient Germans. It has been suggested that they should be called the Celto-Slavs.

It has often been asserted that the French nation was composed of a mixture of various peoples, among which the preponderating element was provided by the Celts. But, on the contrary, the latter, on invading Gaul, found themselves a small minority compared with the natives, just as the Germans were who succeeded them some centuries later.

If it were necessary to pick out from the various races which went to form the French nation one predominating type, this would certainly be found among the Ligurians and the autochthonous tribes, admitting that the Ligurians themselves were immigrants. To speak in general and none too precise terms, it would be safer to say that the French are not Celts but Ligurians.

The mixture might be very roughly apportioned as follows:—

In the formation of the French nation 50 per cent. were autochthonous Ligurians and Iberians, 20 per cent. Celts, 5 per cent. Latins, 16 per cent. Germans, including the Gothic element, 4 per cent. Normans and 5 per cent. various other elements—Greeks, Basques, Semites, Syrians, Africans, etc.

When, in the third century B.C., the Greek artists, who at this time had flourishing schools in Asia Minor, witnessed the arrival of the Celts—great big men, with steel blue eyes and quantities of fair hair which looked as though it were made of sunbeams—the Greek artists, filled with admiration for these warriors with their strong muscles, their virile proportions, firmly planted on their strong legs, abandoned their old models, decadent Greeks and Asiatics, and made statues and bas-reliefs of Celtic figures.

C E L T I C G A U L

When the Celts arrived in Gaul towards the end of the sixth century B.C. they did not find the same race or the same culture everywhere.

Jean Brunhes points out that in the west, from the Pyrenees to the north of Brittany, the Ibero-Armoricans were to be found (Armorican meaning close to the sea); in the central regions, the north and the east, from the Alps to the Channel, were the Ligurians. The former constructed dolmens in which the dead were buried; the latter placed their dead, in a squatting position, in great jars or cists; the former were still a pastoral people, on the sea-coasts they were fishers; the latter were, as we have seen, agriculturists, reaping their harvests with bronze sickles.

The conquest of Gaul by the Celts seems to have occupied the whole of the fifth century B.C.

Between the Rhine and the Pyrenees the Celts found isolated tribes; and, as a matter of fact, the various groups of Ligurians never attempted to unite together. The only form of war they knew was brigandage. The fortresses they had built, their walls of giant stone and their ramparts of heaped earth, provided extremely efficacious defences against surprise attacks from some neighbouring tribe in search of booty; but they were not impregnable shelters against bands of warriors accustomed to mass manœuvres and battles on a large scale. The struggle could nevertheless be extremely bitter. Carthaginian and Phocian navigators, who used to sail within sight of land, very often witnessed a bloody battle, and had opportunities of seeing the ravages of war.

The Celts were triumphant, but the slow nature of their conquest bears witness to the smallness of their numbers. They came with their wives and children and their booty, which they bore in their train in long lines of chariots.

Their language, like the Ligurian, was intimately related to Umbro-Latin. Neo-Celtic dialects are still spoken, in parts of Brittany, in Ireland, in Wales, in the Highlands of Scotland and in the Isle of Man, but their idiom, changed in the course of centuries, shows but faint resemblance to the remains of ancient Celtic preserved for us by the science of epigraphy. This much at least is certain, that the Celtic language must be placed in the great family of so-called Indo-European languages (Latin, Greek, Teutonic, Slav, Sanscrit and Iranian). Penetrating into Gaul, the Celts gave the name to the great stream of water which the Germans consider as par excellence the river of Germany; they called it the Rhine. In Celtic this word means "stream of water." This may possibly be the root of the German word rennen, to run, and of the French word renne, reindeer, which comes from the Teutonic renn, in Swedish ren.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Moreover, the whole Celtic nation did not invade Gaul. Part of it remained on the right bank of the Rhine, which thus became Celtic on both sides, just as both slopes of the Alps were Ligurian and both slopes of the Pyrenees Iberian.

The great body of Celts was divided into tribes, each of which was destined to conquer and settle down in a particular part of Gaul.

The conquerors and the conquered apparently intermingled very quickly. In primitive times, when social distinctions hardly existed and civilisation was still in an embryonic condition, the similarity between religious ideas and practices helped towards this fusion of races into one homogeneous whole.

The Celts, like the Ligurians, deified natural elements—the Earth, the Sky, the Sun, Fire and Thunder—and they honoured local divinities, the gods and goddesses of the Druids. rivers, the springs, the deep forests and the wind-swept peaks, with an ardent worship. With a picturesque imagination they indulged in a belief in charming nymphs who kept watch at the sources of the great rivers, the Seine, the Saône and the Loire. The Celts, like the Ligurians, worshipped above all the Earth, which they pictured in the form of a woman, and doubtless, according to Camille Jullian, they went to pay her homage at the same altars and sanctuaries used by the Ligurians. The Celts, like the Ligurians, used to bow in reverence beneath the branches of the great trees surrounded by the mysterious murmurs of the woods. The Ligurians gave the place of honour to the beech, the Celts to the oak. This religious difference, which in a more advanced civilisation would certainly have led to copious bloodshed, was never emphasised either by the Ligurians or the Celts. They endowed both the beech and the oak with supernatural power in the shape of mysterious fairies which haunted them—the supernatural “dames” of ancient folklore.

“The Druids,” says Pliny the Elder, “hold nothing more sacred than the mistletoe, that, at least, which is found on the English oak. The English oak is for them the divine tree par excellence; their sacred groves consist of this species, and the use of oak leaves is enjoined in all sacrifices. Also a tuft of mistletoe growing from an oak is a sign that it comes from heaven and that the tree has been chosen by some divinity. Mistletoe on an oak is, moreover, exceedingly rare. It is cut in accordance with a strict and detailed ritual and takes place on the sixth day of the new moon, when she gives a fairly strong light but has not yet reached a full half. The priest, clad in a white robe and armed with a golden sickle, climbs the tree and cuts the mistletoe which must be placed at once in a white coverlet.”

We all know how mistletoe is grown; the seeds are carried by birds from branch to branch, but the bark of the oak being particularly hard, the seed can only stick in it and germinate and take root with the greatest difficulty.

To the mistletoe gathered with this ritual of a golden sickle and white coverlet, the Celts attributed marvellous virtues; there was no malady it could not cure.

This cult of trees was destined to survive the passing of centuries, invasions and revolutions. The Catholic Church tried to fight it, but was quick to acknowledge its inability to deal with beliefs deeply rooted in the popular mind; so much so, that many a priest in the country, or even the town districts might have been found holding in deep respect the tree of magic properties; and this naturally led to the discovery of a remedy for the evil. About the supernatural power of the beech or the oak there could be no doubt; and, in order to render homage to it, a pious statue of the Virgin soon came to be fixed to the gnarled surface of the ancient trunks, purifying them and justifying the hymns, the garlands of flowers, the traditional rites and the rustic ceremonies.

Several of these fairy trees have survived to our own day. Others have preserved their pagan character, like the celebrated oak called Lapalud in the neighbourhood of Angers. The Angevins honoured it with a curious attention as late as the nineteenth century. The custom was for every carpenter, joiner, wheelwright and mason who passed beneath the old oak to knock a nail into it. And thus the tree was covered with a coat of iron to a height of nine feet.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The same thing took place with the waters; and since many really did possess healing powers, the cures they effected prolonged the homage paid them. The town of Nîmes owed her protective deity, Nemausus, to the genius of the spring. Among these aquatic divinities there was one who enjoyed exceptional renown. This was the god who bore the name of Borvo or Bormo. Of how many thermal springs was he not the tutelary genius? And together with his name they also preserved the healing virtue with which he had endowed them—la Bourboule, Bourbonne-les-Bains, Bourbon-Lancy, Bourbon-l'Archambault, etc.

Unfortunately, like the Ligurians, the Celts also included in their religious observances the horrible practice of human sacrifice. It is impossible to think of this without a feeling of revolt, though it must be confessed that the early religious rites of all races included this cruel and detestable custom. The Greeks and the Romans who, at the time when they came into contact with the Gauls, had reached a more advanced stage of culture and had forgotten the sacrifices of Homeric days, or regarded them as legends and poetic fictions, speak of the sacrifices of the Druids with a horror which is indeed justifiable. They chose their victims as best they could, first of all from the ranks of those condemned to death; and in those rude ages capital punishment was of frequent occurrence.

Punishments varied in accordance with the variations in the Druidical Pantheon. All the gods demanded human sacrifices in their honour, but were not propitiated by the same kind of execution. Thus the powerful god Esus, the god of battles, preferred his victims to be hanged in the depths of the woods where he had his sanctuaries. The proximity of one of these was made evident to the traveller by the number of bodies swaying from the green branches. The good old poet Gringoire hymned "the fair orchard of the god Esus." An altar consecrated to this amiable personage—I mean the God Esus—was found fitted into a Roman wall on the site where Notre-Dame de Paris was afterwards built.

CELTIC GAUL

Taran, the god of thunder and lightning, whom the Gauls identified with the Roman Jupiter, demanded his victims to be burnt alive; whilst the great Teutates preferred them to be drowned in a tub of water.

Teutates was the great god of the Gauls. His name translated from the Celt means the "national god." He was the inventor of the arts. He protected commerce and was the patron god of merchants. Teutates possessed the most numerous and most crowded sanctuaries. These were as a rule not temples that had been built, but clearings made in the woods. Here the devotion of the pious heaped up treasures of gold and silver, coins and precious vases. After a battle a part of the booty was reserved for the gods who had given victory. This was prompted by the same feeling that makes mankind consecrate to God a part of the fruits of the earth. Later on this was done for the salvation of the soul, by the building of chapels and churches and the foundation of monasteries. By this means the great abbeys derived power which contributed to the progress of the country and it provided one of the sources whence the bishops secured the influence which also proved so beneficent in times of trouble.

The Celts, who were simple-minded in their primitive state of culture, heaped up their gifts to the gods in the spots devoted to their worship—the clearings in the woods or the depths of the sacred lakes, gifts consisting of ingots of gold and silver, sparkling jewels and precious vases. So great was the veneration—or fear—inspired by the god, that no greedy hand dared to touch the treasure. The consul Servilius Cæpio, sent to Gaul against the Cimbri (106 B.C.), sacked the Gallic temple at Toulouse and dragged the sacred lakes. By this means he amassed in ingots of gold and silver a treasure valued at 15,000 talents (£32,000,000 in English money). And, in the following century, the Romans, after having conquered the country, sold at a high price for the benefit of the Treasury the sacred lakes of the Gauls, from which the buyers possessed themselves of the treasure.

After the Gallic trinity, Teutates, Esus and Taran, come such picturesque divinities as Belenus, the god of the thermal healing springs, and of the heights illumined by the rising sun. He taught those of the Druids, who undertook cures, old wives remedies, and the uses of herbs and roots gathered at the solstices, and mysterious formulæ. He had as a companion Sirona, the luminary of the night and the dusky forests, the white Selene of the Greeks, Diana with her opal crescent. Sirona was originally a spring that gurgled beneath the moss of the woods. Then there was a rough and brutal god, the Vulcan of the Celts, the genius of fire and metals, who presided over the subterranean forces. Of none of these divinities have we any certain picture, with the possible exception of Epona, the goddess of the wild steeds and beautiful chargers. The Celts did not feel the necessity of imagining their gods in human or animal form and doubtless did not conceive them thus.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Besides the national gods, the worship of whom was common to all, there were the local and topical divinities, who dwelt in the branches of trees, in the beds of rivers, or on the sunny heights. But the topical divinities were generally vegetarians, satisfied with the wild or cultivated fruits, flowers and herbs presented to them by their worshippers. It was as a rule the great gods who were insatiable man and flesh eaters.

The great variety of the punishments invented by the Druids bears witness to their imagination. We have already mentioned the unfortunate victims who were hanged in honour of the gods, or burnt alive, or drowned; others were crucified, or killed by flogging or by being stoned. Some were shut up together with various animals in great hampers made of wood and osiers, and stuffed with hay and other inflammable material. The whole was burnt together amidst heartrending cries, howls and hoarse entreaties; the flesh crackled in the flames and gave forth a sickening stench—enough to rejoice the hearts of all the gods in the world.

These terrible customs survived for a long time in France, though they lost some of their ferocity, and, with the increasing refinement of life, occasionally adopted a certain picturesque charm. Burnt sacrifices to the gods usually took place in the height of the summer, in the months of June and July. The fires of St. John, which even in our own day are lighted in many a country district, with their graceful rondos and joyous refrains, are but an old tradition, an echo which still resounds after two thousand four hundred years. It was for long the custom in France at the festival of St. John to throw various animals into the flames—cats and moles, foxes and wolves shut up in baskets. In Paris, the magistrates, in their robes of State, were present at the burning ceremony as a sign of its importance. This custom was still in existence in the reign of Louis XIV, when it died out. On the 3rd of July, a few days after St. John's day, they still used to burn in the rue aux Ours, a great wicker basket—the degenerate offspring, fortunately, of the hamper stuffed with men and animals that the Druids used to roast in order to propitiate their gods.

CELTIC GAUL

The Druids also made use of human sacrifice in their divinations. It was their custom, says Strabo, “to cut open a man's back with one stroke of the sword and to make their prophecies in accordance with the way the victim struggled.”

As victims condemned to death were not sufficiently numerous for these frequent holocausts, which the Druids, be it said, made with the best intentions in the world, in order to get rain after a drought, or to heal some distinguished personage, or to secure the happy issue of some useful enterprise—innocent victims were sacrificed, unfortunate creatures who were bought as slaves to be killed, just as calves and pigs are bought in the market. Lastly an abundant source of supply was found in prisoners of war.

But the astonishing fact is that these same Druids who organised such atrocious sacrifices used to study the movements of the stars and the constitution of the elements, they talked of the grandeur of the universe, taught a lofty and refined morality, governed by the most noble belief in the immortality of the soul. They also combated idolatry.

“The Druids,” says Ammianus Marcellinus, “joined together in societies, occupied their minds with profound and sublime questions, raised above human concerns.” They possessed a fairly accurate knowledge of the past of Gaul, maintaining that their race was partly aboriginal and partly from beyond the Rhine, whence it had been ousted from its ancestral hearth by frequent wars and the encroachment of the sea—an extraordinarily accurate theory, proving that they studied and indulged in reflection.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The belief in the immortality of the soul was particularly ardent among the Gauls. So intense was it that the Greeks and Romans, who also shared it, were struck by it. To this belief they attributed the contempt for death which made the Gauls march with bared breasts against enemies armed with helmets and breastplates. The words applied by the Italians to the French noblemen of the time of Louis XIII might have been said of them : "They enter into battle as if they were to rise from the dead the next day." Diodorus Sieulus says that the Gauls held death in such deep contempt that they fought duels and killed each other for the most trifling causes—just like the French noblemen of the time of Louis XIII.

In the traditions of the people of Armorica, with their clear-cut poetical conceptions, this belief in the immortality of the soul took a very picturesque form. The Armoricans believed that the kingdom of the Dead was situated across the sea beyond the setting sun. The crossing was made in a mysterious boat. This belief in the bark of the ferryman of the dead, the bark of Charon, was a popular belief in many lands. It is to be found in the most ancient hymns of the Serbians, in which the oars are held by St. Peter accompanied by the prophet Elijah. The Gauls believed that on the furthest coasts of Brittany a population of silent sailors undertook this imperative task. A long-drawn, low wail which made the air vibrate, like the wind kissing the waves, warned the ferrymen that the bark had arrived to all appearances empty, but really weighed down by the souls it was bearing. The bark swung out to the open sea, the oars beat the water, the crossing took an hour, and the bark neared its destination. A loud voice called out the names of the souls on board; as the recitation proceeded the boat emerged from the water; when the voice was silent the sailors returned with their empty bark.

The teaching of the Druids on matters of religion, morality and the mysteries of Nature was made orally in the form of poems which had to be learnt by heart and were handed down from mouth to mouth. This is a valuable hint which helps to explain the transmission of the Homeric poems, for the latter were composed at a period when writing had not been invented. And it is probable that the most important at least of these druidical poems resembled the poems of Homer, though they may not have possessed the precise literary and artistic form which the Iliad and the Odyssey owed to subsequent revision.

CELTIC GAUL

Thus the Druids had no knowledge of writing, or at all events did not wish to make use of it, in order that the sacred mysteries might not be divulged. They reserved their teaching for the children of the nobility, who were sent to live with them in the depths of the woods or in caves, in the dark shelters of legendary lore. Their teaching exalted the virtues of courage, strength and ambition. Women appear to have had no part in it. The Celts never had a Druidess like the Teutonic Velleda. The virgins of the island of Sein and the bacchantes of the Namnetes, mentioned by the Greeks, were figments of the imagination.

This hidden and mysterious religion from which the mob was excluded and which the priests kept jealously to themselves endured in a stereotyped form. It left its mark on the Roman religion, which was brought into Gaul after Cæsar's conquests; and this explains the popular welcome given to Christianity, which made its appearance under the Emperors. The religion of Christ was the religion of the humble, the weak and the poor. Woman was exalted in the form of the Mother of God. As soon as Christianity reached Gaul, the masses, the working masses of the country, bestowed upon it all their vigour and the irresistible power of their faith.

Nevertheless the Druids cannot be said to have formed a caste; they were an initiated priesthood grouped together under one leader, the chief Druid. The power exercised by the latter was very great, not only in the religious, but also in the social and political world. Religion, in the hands of the Druids, constituted the only national tie binding together the various peoples of Gaul. In the country of the Carnutes, the Druids held general assemblies attended by crowds of the faithful from every quarter. At Fleury, also called Saint-Benoît-sur-Loire, this religion had altars where sacrifices were offered by people from the remotest parts of the country.

The Druids, formed into tribunals, were the supreme judges of the people. Now in a nation possessed of no administrative machinery, the administration of justice constitutes all the government there is. The Druids used to judge all disputes, not only between private individuals, but also between tribes and even cities. They thus rendered a great service to the nation by maintaining relative peace between rival tribes and hostile clans. The Gauls described to Posidonius how their priests interposed as peacemakers and arbitrators between parties ready to tear each other to pieces.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In order to maintain their authority they made use of the most formidable means of constraint—excommunication. The thunder of the Catholic Church when it was at the height of its power, in the most troublous times of the Middle Ages, did not inspire greater respect and fear than the sentence of exclusion from the sacrifice pronounced by the Druids from the depths of a neolithic cave or the midst of a sun-dappled clearing in the woods.

Throughout the whole of Gaul an excommunicated man became a cursed being; he was refused all justice and was shunned by everybody, as he was no longer allowed to approach the altars of purification.

"If a private individual," writes Caesar, "or even the chief of a tribe, refuses to submit to the edicts of the Druids, they cut him off from all religious ceremonies. This is the greatest punishment known in Gaul, and those upon whom it is inflicted are regarded as impious scoundrels. No one speaks to them or comes near them, as they would be sullied by contact with them; they can exercise no public function, and are not even allowed to demand justice before the tribunals."

And if it was a whole clan or tribe or city that had been excommunicated, religious death overtook the district thus penalised. No priest would officiate there, the stones of the altars were deserted, blackened by flames now extinguished, stained with the dark blood that had been shed over them. The bards no longer sang the glories of their ancestors, the magi no longer cured fevers, the sorcerers no longer dressed wounds.

Under the direction of the Druids the order of divine healers, called cubages, and the bards formed, as it were, a lower branch of the priesthood. The name of bard has been handed down to our own days together with that of the barz or village fiddlers of Brittany. They were jugglers who beneath the sonorous whispering of the immemorial oaks, on the sunlit heights and by the side of the refreshing streams, used to sing their divine lays, hymning the mysteries of their religion, the beauty of the moral life, tales of the gods, the valour of their ancestors, and the courage of their warriors. "The bards," writes Ammianus, "sing in heroic verse, to the accompaniment of the lyre, the great deeds of the heroes"—which is an exact definition of epic poetry.

CELTIC GAUL

In poetry as in art all beauty is traditional. The poet or the artist of genius who produces a masterpiece owes it largely to his predecessors and his environment. At two different periods the French, who have the epic mind, produced national poems—in the primitive times of the Druids and during the age of chivalry, in the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries of our era. But both periods were followed by a break in tradition, in the first case by the Roman conquest, and later by the English invasion and the disturbances of the Hundred Years' War, which was followed by a "renaissance" inspired from abroad. The French, whose gifts would have enabled them to produce a hundred Iliads or Odysseys, renounced their birthright because they would not or could not remain faithful to themselves.

Under the rule of the Druids, the healing magi were much more numerous than the bards or jugglers. They are worthy of all respect. They worked, studied botany and practised chemistry. "The eubages," says Ammianus, "tried to explain the forces of nature." "They studied nature," writes Strabo, and from her learnt useful recipés, some of which have been handed down to us by Pliny and by Marcellus Empiricus. They sold unguents made of clarified fat and perfumed with the essences of herbs which they used to go out and gather on the magic nights by the light of the moon. Whether the magic of the nights and the rays of the moon possessed any great power we know not, but sterilised fat scented with herbs carefully distilled was certainly good for wounds. In the combating of disease the eubages also used amulets and cabalistic formulæ. These amulets and formulæ were infallible cures, unless the patient had a corrupt soul, which must first be purified according to the prescribed rites and by appeasing the wrath of the gods by sacrifices. There were occasions when this divine wrath was so great that neither amulets nor sacrifices prevented the sick man from dying.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Healers of this description still existed in Gaul under the Merovingians. Gregory of Tours relates how, in the year 587, the Bishop of Paris had one of them arrested, and on him was found a large pouch filled with divers herbs, the teeth of a mole, some bones of mire and some bear fat. The Bishop had the whole lot thrown into the river and banished the picturesque healer from his diocese.

Description of Gaul. We must not be surprised by the important part played by woods in the religious life of the early Celts. "Gaul with her huge forests," say the ancient writers.

Strabo has described in words that have become famous the harmonious aspect of Gaul, her mountains, her plains, her rivers and her valleys. "Such a felicitous arrangement of natural features, which seems to be the work of an intelligent being rather than the result of chance, would be enough to prove the existence of Providence." In this beautiful arrangement Strabo believed that the Pyrenees were parallel to the Rhine; but, harmonious though it may have been, the aspect of Gaul must nevertheless have been somewhat forbidding.

The district of Bedia, with its fertile fields, was then but woods and marshes; it was famous, not for its cornlands, but for its iron mines. The districts of Orleans, Gâtin, Blois and Périgueux¹ were covered with tangled masses of prehistoric vegetation intersected by marshlands. The huge forest of the Ardennes, with its impenetrable undergrowth, was joined by the forests of Voivre and Argonne to the Vosges, which spread eastwards through the Hercynian forest of legendary lore, of which Cæsar says, "There are no Germans who after a sixty days' march can say where it ends, or know where it begins." The Vosges spread to the north through the impenetrable forests of Haardt and Hünsrück between the Rhine and the Moselle, and to the south through the thick woodlands of the Jura extending into the Alps. For centuries these forests formed between Gaul and

¹ There is no exact modern equivalent for these districts, which in Latin were Pagus Aurelianus, Vastinensis Pagus, Blesensis Pagus, and Pagus Peccicensis.—Tr.

CELTIC GAUL

Germany a barrier more difficult to cross than the flood of the Rhine. Smaller rivers, like the Sambre, the Meuse, the Saône and the Doubs, were swallowed up in them. Only the broad Rhine, with the rocks and mountains along its banks, could make a clear space in their midst. Huge trunks drifted down the Rhine, and also down the Somme and the Meuse, brought down from immense distances by the rivers when they were in flood. In this way the great peat bogs of Belgium were formed.

Thus Gaul was covered with thick forests of trees centuries old joined by an impenetrable undergrowth. In the north were oak, beech and birch trees; in the east pines and firs.

The Ardennes, less imposing in aspect, were covered with a stunted, grey and forbidding vegetation.

Here and there were inhabited caves, sacred groves and marshes surrounding islands on which lake-dwellings were still to be found. Among the fauna various prehistoric monsters still survived.

The rivers, along the greater part of their course, were bordered by swamps and marshes which man would not or could not drain.

Such was the general aspect of the country. But if in the north of Gaul the forests followed each other in almost uninterrupted succession—north of the Seine the country was nothing but a vast tree-covered plain—the ground began to clear towards the south-east. The exploitation of the mines by the Bituriges (Berry) led to a clearing of the woods; the Auverni (Auvergne) and the Aedui (Burgundy) had destroyed many a forest for purposes of agriculture; the Carduci (Quercy) were famous for their flax fields. Cæsar on reaching Gaul found Provence covered with olive trees. It was the custom among the various tribes who were grouped together between the Rhine and the Pyrenees to leave the frontiers of their territory wild and uncultivated, and these districts were quickly covered with shrubs, which thus surrounded the territory of each tribe with a wide belt of green.

As physical conditions play a large part in the moral and material development of a nation, we must not be surprised at the slowness with which primitive man attained civilisation.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

so great that neither amulets nor sacrifices prevented the sick man from dying.

Healers of this description still existed in Gaul under the Merovingians. Gregory of Tours relates how, in the year 587, the Bishop of Paris had one of them arrested, and on him was found a large pouch filled with divers herbs, the teeth of a mole, some bones of mice and some bear fat. The Bishop had the whole lot thrown into the river and banished the picturesque healer from his diocese.

Description of Gaul. We must not be surprised by the important part played by woods in the religious life of the early Celts. "Gaul with her huge forests," say the ancient writers.

Strabo has described in words that have become famous the harmonious aspect of Gaul, her mountains, her plains, her rivers and her valleys. "Such a felicitous arrangement of natural features, which seems to be the work of an intelligent being rather than the result of chance, would be enough to prove the existence of Providence." In this beautiful arrangement Strabo believed that the Pyrenees were parallel to the Rhine; but, harmonious though it may have been, the aspect of Gaul must nevertheless have been somewhat forbidding.

The district of Bedzin, with its fertile fields, was then but woods and marshes; it was famous, not for its cornlands, but for its iron mines. The districts of Orleans, Gâtin, Blois and Perche¹ were covered with tangled masses of prehistoric vegetation intersected by marshlands. The huge forest of the Ardennes, with its impenetrable undergrowth, was joined by the forests of Voivre and Argonne to the Vosges, which spread eastwards through the Hercynian forest of legendary lore, of which Cæsar says, "There are no Germans who after a sixty days' march can say where it ends, or know where it begins." The Vosges spread to the north through the impenetrable forests of Haardt and Hünsrück between the Rhine and the Moselle, and to the south through the thick woodlands of the Jura extending into the Alps. For centuries these forests formed between Gaul and

¹ There is no exact modern equivalent for these districts, which in Latin were Pagus Aurelianus, Vastinensis Pagus, Blesensis Pagus, and Pagus Pecticensis.—Tr.

CELTIC GATE

Germany a barrier more difficult to cross than the flood of the Rhine. Smaller rivers, like the Sambre, the Meuse, the Saône and the Doubs, were stalked up in them. Only the broad Rhine, with the rocks and boulders along its banks, could make a clear space in their wilds. Huge trunks drifted down the Rhine, and also down the Sambre and the Meuse, brought down from immense distances by the rivers when they were in flood. In this way the great peat bogs of Belgium were formed.

Thus Gaul was covered with thick forests of trees centuries old joined by an impenetrable undergrowth. In the north were oak, beech and birch trees; in the east pines and firs.

The Ardennes, less imposing in aspect, were covered with a stunted, grey and forbidding vegetation.

Here and there were inhabited caves, sacred groves and marshes surrounding islands on which lake-dwellings were still to be found. Among the fauna various prehistoric monsters still survived.

The rivers, along the greater part of their course, were bordered by swamps and marshes which man would not or could not drain.

Such was the general aspect of the country. But if in the north of Gaul the forests followed each other in almost uninterrupted succession—north of the Seine the country was nothing but a vast tree-covered plain—the ground began to clear towards the south-east. The exploitation of the mines by the Bituriges (Berry) led to a clearing of the woods; the Auverni (Auvergne) and the Aedui (Burgundy) had destroyed many a forest for purposes of agriculture; the Carduci (Quercy) were famous for their flax fields. Caesar on reaching Gaul found Provence covered with olive trees. It was the custom among the various tribes who were grouped together between the Rhine and the Pyrenees to leave the frontiers of their territory wild and uncultivated, and these districts were quickly covered with shrubs, which thus surrounded the territory of each tribe with a wide belt of green.

As physical conditions play a large part in the moral and material development of a nation, we must not be surprised at the slowness with which primitive man attained civilisation.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

centuries—the federation of neighbouring tribes owing to the development of social intercourse, economic necessity and industrial and commercial activity. Lufetia was the home of the boatmen, Bourges of the metal-workers, Gergovia of the potters, Bibracte of the workers in silver, enamel and bronze. By an exchange of services and of local products, the tribes came to form peoples or small nations on a larger scale, and navigation, iron-works and pottery, though still in their infancy, were more fully developed. Thus were formed the peoples, the "nations," who in their turn founded traditions, and had aspirations and interests in common and served under one chief.

It is estimated that Gaul was divided into four or five hundred tribes, grouped, according to Cæsar's calculations, into seventy-two peoples or nations, not counting the district of Narbonne. Thus a people consisted on an average of four or five to as many as ten tribes.

Though grouped into peoples, the tribes nevertheless preserved a certain independence; each one kept its distinctive character, its traditions and its communal life under its own chief. Such an one was Ambiorix, who, at the time of the wars of independence, was chief of one of the tribes belonging to the people of the Eburi.

These tribal chiefs exercised power in the larger divisions of the people or nation, acting as local magistrates with police jurisdiction. They formed a deliberative assembly within the union, a council, in which common interests were discussed and decisions reached for the benefit of the people or nation. This assembly the Romans afterwards called the senate of the city. The senates of the Gallic cities consisted of the chiefs of the clans or great families, the chiefs of the "gestes" who made up the tribe; the union of several tribes, generally five or six in number, constituted the city. In time of war each of these senators, these chiefs of clans or gestes, marched at the head of his people, like the feudal barons of the eleventh century. In the course of the struggle for independence six hundred senators of the Nervii died sword in hand in the midst of their followers; according to Cæsar only three survived. About the eleventh century the Chanson de Guillaume d'Orange told a similar tale.

Each tribe had its own sanctuary, its place of refuge, its market-place, in which the heads of families met together, thus forming the headquarters or capital of the tribe. And the union of the tribes constituting the people or city also had its sanctuary, its place of refuge, in which the heads of families assembled, thus forming a capital in a spot fortified either by nature or by the art of man.

CELTIC GAUL

At the head of these peoples or nations, each consisting of the union of several tribes, themselves composed of several families, was placed, in the beginning, at all events, a common chief, a prince, or king, whose function was paternal or patriarchal and also religious, similar to the kings in early Greek and Roman civilisation and in France in the Middle Ages.

Monarchy had as a rule disappeared in Gaul towards the end of the second century B.C. As the families by means of the bonds created by "clients" gradually achieved class distinctions, the chiefs of the principal families came to constitute an aristocracy which freed itself from royalty.

This gradual grouping and co-ordination continued until the second century, when the Arverni succeeded in uniting Gaul into one great State under their authority. It was a premature unification, for as yet the interests, customs and traditions of the various nations had little in common; and it was impossible for it to survive.

Several of the Gallic nations, after abolishing their monarchical constitution, nevertheless put the reins of government in the hands of one supreme magistrate, who was, however, elected for a period of one or two years, and called the "vergobret." The vergobret exercised royal authority, but, in matters of foreign policy, important negotiations, or when it was a question of declaring war, he was powerless to act without the national council or senate.

The vergobret was the supreme magistrate, with powers of life and death. He was the chief of the armies, but in the same way as our own President of the Republic—he never went into battle with the troops, but left to the generals the task of leading them.

The vergobret was not allowed to leave the district he governed.

Young men of energy and resolution were frequently raised same thing. These are legends, no doubt, but they reflect the opinion of antiquity. "They made straight for their enemy," says Strabo, "attacking him from the front, without any precaution. They were easily routed by craft."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Romans also bore witness to the bravery of the Gauls, which they carried to the pitch of temerity, their spirit, their love of talking and their fickleness. "The Gauls," says Cato, "have two ruling passions—fighting and talking." Caesar and Hirtius describe them as "frank, open and candid people, waging war by their valour alone without artifice." "They were ready for war at any age; the old men went into battle with just as much courage as the young. They scorned danger, and no man among them ever cut off his thumb, as Italians have done, in order to escape the toll demanded by Mars" (Ammianus).

Add to this a generous spirit, enthusiastically following the first impulse—for good, quick to defend the oppressed. They were chivalrous, and punished the murder of a stranger more severely than that of one of their own citizens; they were so honest that they left the doors of their houses open; but they were also very thirsty, says Strabo. Diodorus calls them "extremely miserly."

The Gauls were very changeable, they would not carry out any complicated enterprise, and grew tired of any sustained or painful effort.

With such faults and qualities, the Gauls could easily achieve brilliant victories over decadent or very primitive nations, or over disunited or newly-founded States. It was much more difficult for them to organise and govern their conquests or to found a lasting Empire.

The bluster and uproar with which the Gauls opened battle soon ceased to terrify their enemies. At the beginning of the battle of Telamon (225 B.C.) the Latins were for a moment terrified by the same spectacle as had filled their ancestors with fear on the banks of the Allia (390 B.C.). In the ranks of the barbarians there was a terrific rattle of arms and armour borne by giants. To the blare of trumpets and war horns the Gauls added shouts and yells; the Latins answered by a cloud of javelins which proved more efficacious in spreading disorder in the ranks of the enemy than were ferocious howls and the clash of brazen instruments. In the hand-to-hand fighting, the Roman sword, which was easily wielded and could cut and thrust, soon got the better of the heavy and cumbrous blade of their adversaries.

CELTIC GAUL

During the third century B.C. the Celts lost their great Empire. The Carthaginians took from them the possession of Spain, the Romans subjugated Cisalpine Gaul. The Celts only remained a sovereign people in Gaul itself, and even so, from that time onwards German tribes from across the Rhine were constantly coming to settle in the northern regions, thus forming to the north of the forests of the Marne that nation consisting of a mixture of Germans, Celts and Ligurians of which the Romans were to make their province of Belgic Gaul.

Several centuries before this time the Greeks had established themselves on the Mediterranean coasts of France. They were, moreover, not the first Eastern nation to land on Marseilles. These shores. As early as the tenth century before our era the Phoenicians had held sway in the western Mediterranean, but only vague traces of their sojourn are to be found in certain names of places.

The foundation of Marseilles by Phoeian emigrants took place about the year 600 B.C.—in 598 B.C. say those historians who are not afraid of giving a precise date.

The Greeks came in search of tin for the making of bronze, and also for amber and coral. Yellow amber was only to be found on the shores of the Baltic, for the ancients did not know of its existence in Sicily; but grey amber, with its sweet scent, formed from the internal concretions of cachalots, was fairly common along the coast of Gascony.

To the foundation of Marseilles is attached a pretty legend which historians have discarded somewhat over-hastily. It is told by Aristotle, who lived two hundred years later; but Aristotle had a critical mind and had given some attention to a study of the past. According to him, a young Phocian merchant called Euxenus—others say his name was Protis—landed about the year 600 B.C. on the coast of the Mediterranean just where the Rhone, with its waters the colour of powdered glass, joined the blue waves of the sea. The Phocian made himself welcome to the natives, the Ligurians. Now it chanced that Nann, the king of the country, with his capital at Vego-briga, wanted to find a husband for his daughter Gyptis. Painters depict Gyptis as a beautiful lithe girl, with long hair the colour of ripe corn. But as Gyptis was a Ligurian from the south of France, she must certainly have been dark. Nann called her suitors together. Euxenus was one of the guests. It was a custom of the country that a young girl should hold out a cup of clear water to the man she loved best. To the astonishment of everybody, Gyptis offered the cup to the stranger. Whereupon Nann gave his daughter to the Phoeian together with sufficient land for the foundation of a small empire.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The anecdote is so pretty and our artists have drawn such charming pictures to illustrate it that it would be a pity if it were not true.

If it is not true we may console ourselves with the reflection that nobody will ever know. Perhaps the truth lies in Camille Jullian's ingenious theory of the king of a primitive tribe welcoming a stranger, who brings him charming gifts from distant cities, and giving him one of his daughters and lands to settle down upon. At all events from this pleasant page of poetry we may gather the welcome given by the Ligurians to strangers who landed with those invaluable treasures—the olive, writing and money.

And this explains why the first alphabet used by the Gauls was the Greek alphabet.

The band of immigrants from Asia Minor was considerably reinforced fifty years later. Driven out by the Persians, the Phocians took to their ships, which formed quite a formidable fleet, but the Carthaginians, together with the Etruscans, inflicted a grave defeat on them just off the island of Corsica (537 B.C.) and the ships were scattered. The majority of them reached Marseilles. The town prospered and became the headquarters of the trade in tin, which was sent there from Great Britain by land and water routes. From the shores of the Channel to the delta of the Rhone the journey took thirty days. Marseilles was crowded. The people of Marseilles founded Agde (from ἀγαθή, the good), Nîmes (from Νίκαια, the Victorious) Antibes (from Ἀρτεμονίς, the Citadel) and Ollières, the fortunate, close to the present town of Hyères. . . . Right into Spain did they carry the seeds of colonies destined to grow and flourish.

CELTIC GAUL

The friendship between the Phocians of Marseilles and their neighbours the Ligurians did not last very long. After the death of King Nann the town was attacked, but succeeded in holding out. Warned by this alarm, she strengthened her ramparts. It was owing to this hostility and their marked differences in custom and culture that the Greeks of Marseilles tried to isolate themselves from the surrounding people, thus preserving intact the traditions and the civilisation of their own country. But this did not prevent the inhabitants of Marseilles from carrying their trade into the heart of Gaul, travelling up the valley of the Rhone, descending the Garonne and the Loire as far as the Atlantic coast and the Seine as far as Rouen. In the Atlantic ports they again met Greeks embarking for Great Britain in search of tin.

The decadence of the Phocians, who were obliged to give way before the attacks of the Persians, the Etruscans and the Carthaginians, prevented the people of Marseilles from receiving any new elements of strength or prosperity; but, through its own energy the town developed its industries and its military virtues in such a way as to secure hundreds of years of active and glorious life. The coins of Marseilles, and especially the silver pieces, were eagerly sought for throughout the west and as far as the banks of the Danube.

In the fourth century B.C. Marseilles was the headquarters of Greek culture on the Mediterranean, from the shores of Sicily to the Straits of Gibraltar. Her temples were the most highly venerated sanctuaries of the worshippers of the Homeric gods. Her culture, it is true, was not of a very high order. The remains of ancient art handed down to us through Marseilles do not bear the imprint of the classic age of Greece; but after Tarentum had been violated by the soldiers of Pyrrhus and Syracuse by Hannibal, after Mummius had sacked Corinth and Sulla had entered Athens, the civilisation of Pallas Athene was only preserved in all its purity in this Phocian colony.

The people of Marseilles maintained their vessels of war with jealous care, and transformed them in keeping with the progress of poliorcetics. Strabo says that they were particularly clever in the construction of machines of war. Decadence, it is true, set in during the course of the third century B.C. The Carthaginians, Hamilcar and Hasdrubal, wrested her Spanish colonies from Marseilles (236-220), whose people thereupon threw themselves into an alliance with Rome. G. Bloch is of opinion that Hannibal chose the route of southern Gaul and the Alps because he was afraid of the fleet of Marseilles in alliance with Rome.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The defeat of Carthage (146 B.C.) gave Marseilles the monopoly of trade with the East, but the alliance with Rome had become a protectorate. The fleet of Marseilles was used to carry the Roman legions into Spain. The Roman allies were transformed into masters, against whom, it is true, the brilliant colony rose in a sudden outburst of energy, so that Cæsar at one time was afraid that the engineers, the sailors and the citizens of Marseilles might shatter his destiny.

At the beginning of the fifth century B.C., when they crossed the Rhine in order to occupy Gaul, the Celts were apparently already divided into various peoples, each of whom set out for the conquest of a particular part of the territory they invaded and settled down as rulers of it. Cæsar found them in their original cantons. Each people gave its name to the occupied region, and these regions in their turn were responsible for the name of the town which was destined to become the capital—if this word may be used at such an early date—a capital which served the tribe scattered over the district as a fortress, a place of refuge and a centre for supplies.

The States of Gaul
The heart of Gaul the Bitunges settled down in the district of Bourges, the Senones in Sens, the Aedu in Autun, the Tricassii round about Troyes, the Carnutes in the region of Chartres and Orleans, the Arverni in Auvergne, the Allobroges in Dauphiné, the Lingones in the neighbourhood of Langres, the Nervii on the Sambre, the Treveri on the Moselle, and the great people of the Aulerii in the district of Le Mans and Lure.

At the time of the Celtic invasion the Bitunges seem to have been the dominant people, and they did not take long to make Bourges the strongest fortress and the richest town of Gaul. Cæsar praised its beauty. Its ramparts, the defensive power of which was increased by a belt of marshland, were thirty-nine feet high, and the country surrounding it was bounded by moors and marshes. The territory of which Bourges was the capital was the proud possessor of iron mines, and the Bituriges worked them with a skill and energy which made them famous. The celebrated Ambigatus was king of the Bituriges in the third century B.C.; he was a patriarchal monarch whose rule partook of an epic and religious character. He has been called the Charlemagne of the Celts.

CELTIC GAUL

Ambigatus had at his disposal the most formidable military power of the time, due, no doubt, in large measure to the skill of his people in forging weapons of war out of the iron extracted from their soil. To the Bituriges was due the invention of tinning.

But two hundred years afterwards, in the first century B.C., Cæsar found the Bituriges among the clients of the Aedui. For the Celtic tribes of Gaul obtained the suzerainty over one another in different ways; some were protective tribes, other tribes were clients subjected to the former in "faith" and "friendship." There were tributary peoples and sovereign peoples. We read that the Arverni held the Vellavii (the people of Velay) "under their rule." And there were allied peoples, federations in which one of the allies held command.

The power of the Aedui had increased as that of the Bituriges declined. Bibracte, their stronghold was, owing to its position, probably the most impregnable in Gaul. It is known to-day as Beuvray in the district of Nièvre. In Bibracte we find the Celtic root "bebros"; Bibracte seems to have signified "the town of the beaver springs."

With its pointed peak dominating the countryside, and commanding the valleys of the Loire, the Saône and the Seine, the haughty fortress of Mount Beuvray reared its head above the plain below. This capital of the Aedui disappeared, and was only found again in 1867, when it was excavated. One wide thoroughfare ran through it, cutting it in half like an apple, from one gate of the town to the other. The houses, which in front were level with the street, at the back were five or six feet underground. Their foundations were made of masonry, their walls, made of partitioned clay, were framed with huge supporting rafters. They had neither windows nor chimneys. The Aedui made their capital not only a stronghold, but also an industrial town, with sounding smithies, buzzing workshops filled with bronze-workers, metal gravers, and enamellers, trades each of which occupied a different quarter of the town.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The art of enamelling was at that time the glory of the Celts. The Greeks and Romans marvelled at it. They would not believe the tales of the first travellers who told them that over there, in the land of the setting sun, the barbarians poured liquid purple on to partitioned metal and made it stick on as hard stone. Philostratus mentions it with the greatest admiration. The excavations at Bibracte brought to light instruments and articles made by the enamellers. The Celtic enamels were generally red, in close imitation, it would seem, of the coral which the Gauls were so fond of setting in glittering gold.

Thus in the third century n.c. Bibracte was the most important industrial centre in Gaul. In these smithies and workshops half hidden underground, the subjected workman spent his days in dark and unremitting toil, like some slave chained to his task. Workmen's tombs have been found under the vices and anvils from which they were not separated even in death.

The Aedui maintain that they were akin to the Romans.

Gradually they extended their power over the neighbouring peoples, some of whom became their clients, and others their allies, but allies subordinate to them. Their patronage extended from the Loire to the Saône, and in the north to the Seine, and they might have succeeded in uniting the whole of Gaul under their authority, just as the Parisii in the centuries that followed realised the unification of France, if they had not fallen foul of the power of the Arverni, who also aimed at the hegemony, which indeed they apparently attained towards the end of the third century, at the time when Hannibal crossed Gaul.

A strong race, with great energy and strength of character, having made the rough territory which in all its blankness had formed the central core of Gaul their own, the Arverni consisted of stubborn workers on the land, amongst whom a class of skilled artisans had also come into being. The Bituriges were smiths, the Arverni were potters. At Lezoux (Puy-de-Dôme) the ovens were “baking” night and day, and hardening the clay. Even in the most rustic-looking villages muffles were to be found in full activity. The Arverni supplied domestic utensils for the greater part of Gaul.

CELTIC GAUL

Like the Bituriges, the Arverni were ruled by an elected monarch assisted by a senate—an office held for life with sovereign authority, an elective kingship which, as a matter of fact, frequently became hereditary. Two kings of the Arverni, Luernus and his son Bituitus, who became king on the death of his father, provided a short but brilliant page of history. They lived in the second century, and their authority extended over almost the whole of Gaul. They even held sway over the Belgæ.

Greek and Italian travellers saw Luernus advancing along the road at the head of a picturesque train of followers including howling dogs of war. A collar and bracelets of gold gleamed against the purple and gold of his dress. He rode erect on a chariot studded with silver. Behind him soldiers bore the Gallic standards, with their device of the wild boar, and at his side a bard sang his valour to the accompaniment of the lyre. With a grand gesture, which the poet compares to that of a husbandman sowing seed, Luernus threw handfuls of gold and silver coins to the subjects who followed his chariot.

On a certain day in the year, in order to “feed” his subjects, Luernus had a space enclosed measuring over two miles in circumference. Here all manner of food was collected, vessels full of wine or ale were crowded side by side. In this gargantuan enclosure, every man could drink and stuff to his heart’s content.

Later on we shall read about the battles of Bituitus against the Romans, which covered the Arverni with glory; but their greatest triumph was the production of Vercingetorix.

The Sequani established themselves between the Saône and the Jura, and spread northwards as far as the valley of the Ill between the Vosges and the Rhine. They occupied the cantons which afterwards formed the Franche-Comté, Burgundy and Upper Alsace. They were agriculturists who devoted themselves more particularly to breeding cattle—sheep and pigs. From them the Romans obtained the salt pork of which they were as fond as the English are to-day of Danish bacon. They exercised of their ancient lineage may still be found in the various countries of France.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Civilisation of Gaul. In building their houses, the Gauls made little use of stone; until the arrival of the Romans they were but clumsy masons and mediocre quarrymen. Even their gods possessed but few temples built by man.

Strabo describes the houses of the Gauls in the following words: "Built of planks and wattles of reeds, they were spacious and round in shape, covered with heavy arched roofs"—roofs of thatch. But these were more or less important buildings.

In the first century before our era Vitruvius describes the homes of the Gauls as follows: "Some are caves hollowed in the mountain side, others shelters resembling swallows' nests, made of clay and branches of trees."

The floors were made of beaten earth, and the only chimney was a hole in the roof by which the smoke escaped. There were small square windows, without glass, of course, closed by outside shutters. The door was made of wattles of reeds.

There is a picture of a Gallie house on an antique bas-relief in the Louvre depicting a Gaul defending his house against a Roman. It looks like a bee-hive.

Moreover, a fighting Gaul was proud of cutting off the head of his vanquished foe and bringing it home at his saddle-bow in order to hang it up on the wall of his house. A Gaul of any standing always had a small stock of these trophies preserved in cedar resin with which to renew this decoration, a stock which he was never tired of showing with pride to his visitors. Among the favourite subjects of the coiners of the Bituriges and the Aedui was the head of a warrior with a triumphant halo of severed heads around it; another was the figure of a warrior brandishing a trumpet in one hand and the head of his vanquished foe in the other.

They had little furniture, nothing but some low tables and coffers that also served as seats. Meals were taken sitting on the skins of wolves or dogs (Diodorus Siculus), or on bundles of straw and dead leaves (Strabo). At night these skins and straw heaps served as beds. The more well-to-do Gauls had carpets and mattresses of wool.

CELTIC GAUL

As luxury developed, the rich decorated the outsides of their doors with slabs of silver or some other shining metal.

The Gauls loved isolated dwellings in rustic surroundings, on the bank of some river full of fish, or on the confines of a forest abounding in game.

They lived on milk and venison, and also on fresh or salt pork. "Their pigs," says Strabo, "larger, stronger and swifter than those of other countries, wandered loose in the fields. They were as formidable as wolves."

The Gauls loved beautiful dogs and fine horses, and they paid a very high price for the mastiffs they imported from Great Britain.

It is not to be wondered at that hunting was their greatest passion, for it was not only a great pleasure to them, but also of practical use, since the fruits of it constituted a large proportion of their food. The most abundant form of game, if not the most sought after, consisted of the wild pigs from which the Gauls bred their domestic pigs. They crossed their hunting dogs with wolves. On leaving the woods, the huntsman would emerge into some clearing consecrated to a druidic god—a propitious spot for cutting up the game and sacrificing part of it to the proteeting divinities.

The towns of the Gauls served as places where people met together, provisions were stored, and fairs and markets held, even more than as centres of habitation. In them Caesar depicts Gauls eager for news, questioning travellers, surrounding merchants and pressing them to tell all they had learnt.

"The capitals," says Fustel de Coulanges, "were merely small towns in which the senate met on the days it assembled." They were strongholds and centres of worship. In ordinary times few people visited them. Strabo describes the town of Vienne, the capital of the Allobroges, as a simple village.

The capital was by preference chosen in some spot protected by natural defences. To quote Strabo once more, "It is considered good for a town to occupy as strong a position as possible," a rugged rock, the sides of a mountain, like Gregovia, Alisia and Bibracte, or to be surrounded by water, like Lutetia and Melun, or, like Bourges, to be encircled by a belt of muddy marshland.

The area included within the confines of a town was often

THE EARLIEST TIMES

of their ancient lineage may still be found in the various countries of France.

The Civilisation of Gaul. In building their houses, the Gauls made little use of stone; until the arrival of the Romans they were but clumsy masons and mediocre quarrymen. Even their gods possessed but few temples built by man.

Strabo describes the houses of the Gauls in the following words: "Built of planks and wattles of reeds, they were spacious and round in shape, covered with heavy arched roofs"—roofs of thatch. But these were more or less important buildings.

In the first century before our era Vitruvius describes the homes of the Gauls as follows: "Some are caves hollowed in the mountain side, others shelters resembling swallows' nests, made of clay and branches of trees."

The floors were made of beaten earth, and the only chimney was a hole in the roof by which the smoke escaped. There were small square windows, without glass, of course, closed by outside shutters. The door was made of wattles of reeds.

There is a picture of a Gallie house on an antique bas-relief in the Louvre depicting a Gaul defending his house against a Roman. It looks like a bee-hive.

Moreover, a fighting Gaul was proud of cutting off the head of his vanquished foe and bringing it home at his saddle-bow in order to hang it up on the wall of his house. A Gaul of any standing always had a small stock of these trophies preserved in cedar resin with which to renew this decoration, a stock which he was never tired of showing with pride to his visitors. Among the favourite subjects of the coiners of the Bituriges and the Aedui was the head of a warrior with a triumphant halo of severed heads around it; another was the figure of a warrior brandishing a trumpet in one hand and the head of his vanquished foe in the other.

They had little furniture, nothing but some low tables and coffers that also served as seats. Meals were taken sitting on the skins of wolves or dogs (Diodorus Siculus), or on bundles of straw and dead leaves (Strabo). At night these skins and straw heaps served as beds. The more well-to-do Gauls had carpets and mattresses of wool.

CELTIC GAUL

As luxury developed, the rich decorated the outsides of their doors with slabs of silver or some other shining metal.

The Gauls loved isolated dwellings in rustic surroundings, on the bank of some river full of fish, or on the confines of a forest abounding in game.

They lived on milk and venison, and also on fresh or salt pork. "Their pigs," says Strabo, "larger, stronger and swifter than those of other countries, wandered loose in the fields. They were as formidable as wolves."

The Gauls loved beautiful dogs and fine horses, and they paid a very high price for the mastiffs they imported from Great Britain.

It is not to be wondered at that hunting was their greatest passion, for it was not only a great pleasure to them, but also of practical use, since the fruits of it constituted a large proportion of their food. The most abundant form of game, if not the most sought after, consisted of the wild pigs from which the Gauls bred their domestic pigs. They crossed their hunting dogs with wolves. On leaving the woods, the huntsman would emerge into some clearing consecrated to a druidic god—a propitious spot for cutting up the game and sacrificing part of it to the protecting divinities.

The towns of the Gauls served as places where people met together, provisions were stored, and fairs and markets held, even more than as centres of habitation. In them Cæsar depicts Gauls eager for news, questioning travellers, surrounding merchants and pressing them to tell all they had learnt.

"The capitals," says Fustel de Coulanges, "were merely small towns in which the senate met on the days it assembled." They were strongholds and centres of worship. In ordinary times few people visited them. Strabo describes the town of Vienne, the capital of the Allobroges, as a simple village.

The capital was by preference chosen in some spot protected by natural defences. To quote Strabo once more, "It is considered good for a town to occupy as strong a position as possible," a rugged rock, the sides of a mountain, like Gregovia, Alisia and Bibracte, or to be surrounded by water, like Lutetia and Melun, or, like Bourges, to be encircled by a belt of muddy marshland.

The area included within the confines of a town was often

THE EARLIEST TIMES

It is true that the high roads were widened, strengthened and improved by the Romans, but they only followed the course of the long roads of the Gauls, which crossed the country and united their capitals in a way so well suited to their communal existence. These Gallic roads have never been appreciated at their true worth. They were wide and strong enough to allow Cæsar to march his armies with all their impedimenta over them. The rivers and streams were crossed by means of wooden bridges and the marshes on causeways made of piles of wood and trunks of trees.

The rivers were the scenes of busy traffic. Regular flotillas went up and down the Seine, the Saône, the Loire and the Rhone, the celebrated confraternity of Parisian boatmen dated from before the Roman conquest. Transports were organised to carry the merchandise from the Rhine and Saône on to the Loire and Seine ships, and vice versa.

It is easy, from the produce of the soil and from what has just been said about their industries, to imagine the kind of goods the Gauls exchanged with each other. Trade with foreign nations was also developed. From the shores of the Baltic came yellow amber, from Great Britain tin and the great war dogs, the Gauls, on their side, and more particularly the Veneti, loaded up their ships for England with linen and woollen goods, the grey amber from the shores of Gascony, the products of their metal industries, bronze and silver plated copper, their glass work, their pastel from Languedoc, which the inhabitants of Great Britain used for tattooing themselves, and wine carried no doubt in their own rounded casks.

From Marseilles Gaul exported to Italy agricultural implements and carriages and cloth. Strabo says that the Gauls supplied the whole of Italy with the sagum, a kind of heavy cloak made of thick, hairy wool. They sold to the Romans the soap of which they were the inventors, and in the way of food, oil and figs and pork, and more particularly the smoked hams of the Sequani and of the Menapii extolled by Martial. The fat geese of the Morini were also regarded as a great delicacy on the banks of the Tiber. They were delivered within sight of the Capitol, which had once been saved by their illustrious sisters, in large flocks driven by gay peasant boys, for, with necks outstretched, they made this long journey on foot, owing to the curious belief that the flesh of geese is more delicate when the birds are tired.

CELTIC GAUL

The use of money as a means of exchange was widespread. The Greeks and Carthaginians had taught its use, and from the third century B.C. onwards the Gauls struck their own local coins, an art never achieved by the other so-called barbarian peoples, more particularly the Ligurians of Italy, in spite of their contact with the Romans and with the Massaliotes along the coast of Provence, nor yet by the Germans, who, it seems, were summoned to regenerate Gaul, but as regards money never handled any coin that had not been stolen from their neighbours.

The Gallic coins did not, it is true, possess the delicacy and finish of the Greek and Roman coins, but many of their devices, with their worn inscriptions, are full of life and virile imagination to which the engraver, within the limited means at his disposal, succeeded in giving a happy turn. The profile and name of any given individual, a war chieftain, or the king of a city, appear but rarely before the last days of independent Gaul, the days of Dumnorix and Vercingetorix; but the inspired treatment of these little figures both, on the obverse and reverse, shows originality and an occasionally disconcerting but always pleasing fancy.

We have just mentioned the esteem in which the Latins held the industry of the Gauls; but they admired their agriculture no less, and the way in which they bred cattle, more particularly their cows, sheep and pigs, and the good account to which they turned them. The corn of Gaul was famous, as was also their beautiful white bread, and the ancestors of the French people had already the reputation of being the largest bread eaters in the world.

From barley the Gauls brewed their ale, a light-coloured beer, in honour of which the Emperor Julian wrote some charming verses :

“ On Wine made from Barley.

“ Who art thou, whence dost thou come? A new Bacchus?
I know thee not. I swear it by Bacchus, the true Bacchus. I know by this name only the son of Jupiter. His scent is the scent of nectar. As for thee, thy smell is that of the he-goat.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

For want of grapes, the Gauls have made thee from corn. Well mightest thou be called ‘the wine of Ceres.’ ”

The Gauls knew the value of manures. They fertilised their land with lime and marl, that marl for which they sometimes dug deep down into the soil, to the bewilderment of the Romans, who were astonished to see people “manuring earth with earth.”

The study of the clothing of the Gauls is full of interest. The dress of the peasant in the fields, both male and female, has hardly changed since the third century before our era to the present day. This may be seen from Roman bas-reliefs. It consisted of breeches, that is to say trousers, and the Celtic smock held in at the waist by a belt. Many of the peasants used fur, more particularly goat skins, instead of material.

Thus the three principal articles of the Gallic dress were the breeches (trousers), sometimes with wide legs, sometimes with fairly narrow legs drawn in at the ankles. In the rural class the breeches very often ended above the knee. The body was covered by the tunic or smock, slit down the front, sometimes only down to the waist, sometimes all the way, drawn in by a belt and having long sleeves; and lastly the sagum or cloak, hooked sometimes on the right shoulder, sometimes on the breast, and often provided with a hood. The Romans, after making fun of this style of dress, ended by adopting it, so much more practical was it than their own togas and tunics; and in our own day the dress of the old Gauls has become the costume of three-quarters of the world.

These are facts of great ultimate importance. It is customary to talk of the Latin civilisation of France, but is this not one of the most grievous errors of official history? To their ancestors, the Celts and the Ligurians, the French owe much more than to the Romans, even leaving out of account their blood and race. We have already mentioned the agricultural implements, the coach-building, the art of working in metals and stained glass. But the bed with a mattress was also a Gallic invention, and it was from the Gauls that the Romans borrowed it. We have seen that the Roman roads merely followed the tracks of the Gallie roads. And when Christianity arrived, which contained nothing, or very little, that was Roman, Gaul breathed her own spirit into it. And, as we shall see, it was the same with regard to language.

CELTIC GAUL

Writing and the use of money came to Gaul, not through the Romans, but through the Greeks.

The Gauls had a greater influence over the Latins than the Latins had over them. They gave the Romans many of the essential elements of life—dress, agricultural implements, bedding and coach-building. The truth is—and it cannot be too often or too loudly and emphatically repeated—the truth is that French civilisation, modern civilisation, is essentially a Gallic civilisation, born from the fusion of the two elements of Celt and Ligurian, of which the latter, as Camille Jullian has already observed, was responsible for the greater part.

The rich Gauls loved luxury on their persons much more than in their houses. They covered themselves with jewels, rings, bracelets, necklaces and golden fibulae set with coral. They were particularly fond of this combination of gold and coral, which harmonised with their long fair hair, and the brilliancy of their child-like pink and white complexions. They used to wash their fair hair in lime water in order to make it fairer still. When they did not let it flow loose in the breeze, they knotted it up in a bunch on their heads, which, according to Diodorus Siculus, made them look like the god Pan.

The Gauls, said Ammianus, were very clean in their persons, tending their long hair, their drooping moustaches, and their fresh complexions. And he adds : “ You will never find among them, as you find elsewhere, a man or woman, however poor, in dirty or ragged clothes.”

They loved bright and variegated colours in their clothes, and the materials of the rich were worked with gold thread. Their sagum, or hooded cloak, described by Diodorus Siculus, was generally made of material with coloured stripes or checks, a bright contrast to the monotonous white of the Roman togas, and the monotonous black of Spanish clothes. They did not wear the same cloaks in summer as in winter. In winter the wool of which they were made was thick, coarse and as it were hairy; in the summer, on the other hand, it was very fine. Strabo says that in order to make some of their sheep grow finer wool the Gauls used to cover them with skins.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Not only their cloaks, but their other garments were also usually made of wool, home-grown wool strongly woven; only the poor continued to wear the linen of neolithic times. The poor labourer, says an old song, "is clothed in canvas like n windmill."

The war dress of the rich and noble Gauls was even more magnificent. Their helmets and shields were encrusted with gold and coral. Their helmets were pointed; in very early times they finished up in one very long point.

Virgil gives a beautiful description of a Gallic chieftain climbing the Capitol. His thick red hair seemed made of sunlight, over his brilliant tunic he wore a cloak with bright coloured stripes and a collar of gold sparkled on his milk-white neck.

On State occasions the warrior would dress himself up in terrifying horns, the head of an animal, or some other curious fetich; the fantastic tourney helmets of the mediæval jousters were of this description.

The Gaul of noble birth never went out without his sword, which he wore on the right side, whilst the Roman only carried this weapon into battle; and this is n custom which the Gauls handed down to the knights and nobles descended from them.

Feudalism in Gaul. By the third and second centuries before our era the progress of agriculture and industry had borne fruit and wealth had become concentrated in the hands of the strongest.

The Celtic race had founded its social organisation on the family. The power of the father was absolute, as it was in Rome. Until he was old enough to bear arms, a son was not allowed to meet his father in public. The subordination of women was complete and polygamy was allowed.

About the principal branch of n family were grouped the minor branches in such n way as to form, under the authority of the chieftain, n society composed of clans. The clan in Gaul beenme the living and active cell of society, similar to the gens in Rome.

There has been much discussion regarding the tenure of property among the Gauls. It was their custom to appropriate not only articles, but also land. We know from Caesar that litigation in connection with the inheritance of estates frequently occurred in the time of the Druids.

CELTIC GAUL

Like the Romans, the Celts extended the family by means of clients.

Thus their social system was one of clientage, if we call it after the subordinates, one of patronage, if we call it after the protectors. But this is feudalism.

Feudalism, which we must beware of regarding as exclusively military, is a form of society through which all great peoples have passed in the early days of their history. It existed in Egypt, Greece, Rome and Gaul; it will be found again at the beginning of French civilisation. It also existed in an identical form during the corresponding period of Japanese history. The picture drawn by Maurice Croiset of the social organisation of Greece in Homeric times, and by Benjamin Guérard of France in the tenth century, are exactly similar, whilst the patronate in Rome and in Gaul was identical. And it is impossible to maintain that either of these people borrowed from the other, for at this epoch in their history they were unknown to one another. In each case similar social and political conditions produced similar institutions.

Thus, in the third and second centuries B.C. in Gaul the patronate, that is to say feudalism, was, as in early Rome, a very living and vigorous institution. Cæsar observed that it formed the essential element in Gallic society. He called the chieftains of the great families "knights," the subordinates "clients" or "ambacti," attached to the patron by ties of faith and devotion in return for the protection he afforded them, just like the vassals in feudal France. Vassals! Fustel de Coulanges actually called them by this name. Beneath the clients came the slaves, corresponding to the serfs of the Middle Ages.

The tie binding the client to his patron, the "ambactus" to his "knight" and later the vassal to his lord, was a very close one. "It is a crime," says Cæsar, "it is sacrilege among the Gauls for a man to abandon his patron if the latter is in danger." The patron on his side owed his client similar devotion. "No man," says Cæsar, "allows his clients to be oppressed."

Some have regarded the ambacti as forming a superior class

THE EARLIEST TIMES

the system, those distressing little incidents of everyday life. In the absence of a national authority, a sovereign judge and administrator, wielding a power respected by all, the weak begged protection from the strong—the small enclosure against the neighbouring domain, the merchant against the brigand, the agricultural labourer against the marauder, the families of lesser importance against their more numerous rivals who were in a position to reduce them to servitude.

"The poor and weak," says Fustel de Coulanges, "sought the protection of the powerful and rich, in order to be able to live in peace and protected from violence. They rendered him obeisance in return for his protection."

The overlord had among his supporters all sorts and conditions of men—warriors, labourers, artisans, coiners who struck coins, in the later days with his own image engraved on them; around him were bards, like the troubadours and jugglers of the twelfth century, who sang his glory and the great deeds of his ancestors, the bards of the "chansons de geste" who extolled his lineage. The story is well known of the Roman general who saw approaching him a Gallic chieftain surrounded by his vassals in arms and his war dogs, preceded by the bard who, to the strains of the lyre, celebrated his exploits. First of all the bard sang, hymning the illustrious birth and valour of his master, and the Romans laughed as men laugh who imagine they are clever.

Such were the divisions of society in Gaul in the third and second centuries before our era, though there are still a few elements we have not mentioned. As in France in the twelfth century there was a good deal that escaped the power of the patron—adventurers, bandits in the strictest sense of the word, isolated, sicc embittered and wretchedly a hard life of day... v districts; there were and pedlars, b... . . . of agric... . . .
who went to farm and vil' towns the
a proport' nts were fairly These : gradually in tance; to to arms they respond, young hem

CELTIC GAUL

the Bellovaci, in his turn, formed them into groups, with the result that the senate of the Bellovaci, says Hirtius, "had less authority than the ignorant populace."

Below the overlord and his clients came the subject people, and below them again was the mass of slaves, who were either men taken in war or bought in the market. The traffic in slaves between Gaul and Italy was very active from the second century B.C. onwards. It was the custom, on the death of an overlord, to burn his chief slaves, together with his favourite animals, at his funeral. The belief of the period in material survival after death is well known. Food was placed near the tomb, and slaves and domestic animals were sacrificed in order that the departed might still make use of their services. Cæsar says that this custom only died out shortly before his arrival in Gaul.

It is astonishing to find Fustel de Coulanges arriving at the following conclusion : "There was a great difference between the old institutions [the system of overlords and clients in Gaul] and those of the Middle Ages. A sort of vassalage already existed, but outside the State. This vassalage among the Gauls did not give birth to State feudalism."

It is difficult to understand the meaning of the illustrious historian. Vassalage among the Gauls played the identical part it afterwards did in the Middle Ages—without, however, supposing that the latter institution was a development of the former. It constituted a feudal State, and although in Gaul it may not have existed on the grand scale of its counterpart in the Île-de-France, this was because, as we shall see, its development was brutally arrested by a foreign Power.

On emerging from their earliest period, the Gauls entered upon the most glorious epoch of their civilisation, which, after having been imposed, in all its essential elements, upon the Romans themselves, extended over the Rhine into Germany. Under the strong protection of their feudal system, they were advancing towards a brilliant destiny, when an invasion more terrible than that of any savage tribes suddenly burst upon them—the invasion by a nation which, in spite of all its wicked cruelty, was regarded as civilised. Julius Cæsar, a man of genius, of a selfish, hard and narrow genius, enslaved Gaul at the time of her early

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And, on the eastern frontier, beyond the Rhône, were the savage Germans; beyond the Alps, the Ligurians, properly so-called; and beyond the Ligurians, the Romans.

In 155 B.C. the Massaliots invoked the help of Rome against the Ligurians, who were harassing them, and Flaminius, sent to give the Ligurians a lesson, was met by a shower of stones. The consul Opimius defeated the Ligurians (154 B.C.) and took from them part of their territory which he gave to the Massaliots.

Thirty years later there was a fresh intervention on the part of the Romans on behalf of the latter, against a Celto-Ligurian tribe whom the Greeks called the Sallyes (people of Provence). The Sallyes were defeated first in 125 B.C. by the consul Flavius, and a year later by the consul Caius Sextius, who sold most of the population by auction, and on their territory founded a colony, "the waters of Sextius," Aqua-Sextia, Aix.

The Allobroges (Dauphiné), a rough and free-spirited race, tried to drive out this colony of foreign soldiers, who were of no use to them. They were allied with the Arverni, who aspired to the hegemony of Gaul; whereupon the Aedui, in order to get the better of the Arverni, made advances to Rome.

The Aedui, like the Romans, had under the name of a republic an aristocratic form of government; whilst among the Arverni under the rule of their king, the celebrated Bituitus, the popular element predominated, the "commons," as it was called in the Middle Ages.

The Allobroges welcomed the fugitive Sallyes with all honour. As the Aedui had declared themselves in favour of Rome, Bituitus, the ally of the Allobroges, ravaged their territory. In 122 B.C. the consul Gnaeus Domitius Ahenobarbus set out with a strong army, including elephants, with which he hoped to terrify the Gauls, who had never seen any before. The meeting between the ambassador of Bituitus and Ahenobarbus has become famous. The Arvernian arrived accompanied by his bards, his war dogs and his ensigns with the device of the boar. The bard began by singing to the accompaniment of the lyre the glory of Bituitus and his messenger, which the Romans thought extremely funny. Bituitus sent them offerings to conciliate them, but Ahenobarbus would not listen, and a battle took place at the confluence of the Isère and the Rhône.

CELTIC GAUL

The tactics of the Romans, the superiority of their equipment and their huge elephants won them the victory (121 B.C.). According to Latin historians 120,000 Gauls perished as compared with 15 (sic) Romans.

After his defeat Bituitus begged an audience of the conqueror. But when once the Roman had his adversary in his grasp he preferred to keep him. The noble chief of the Arverni was dragged to Rome and displayed like a fatted ox in the triumphal procession. The Roman populace shouted enthusiastically at the sight of the Gallic prince in his shining armour. But were they ever told to what blackguardism they owed this fine spectacle? Probably not; and if they had been told, they would no doubt have thought it all the funnier.

In order to make sure that the efforts of Bituitus would not be repeated, the Roman Senate had his son, Congentiatus, delivered up to them by the aristocracy of the Arverni, and felt they were thenceforward safe in that quarter.

The fall of Bituitus ended the monarchic system among the Arverni, and, out of sympathy, in all the other states of Gaul in which it had revived. The heads of clans, representing the aristocracy and what the Romans called the cause of liberty, everywhere obtained the upper hand—a sorry change for the friends of independence.

After despoiling the Sallyes of their territory (123 B.C.) the consul Sextius laid hands on that of the Vocontii, and the cantons to the east and south of the Cevennes were obliged to submit to the yoke of the Roman wolf. Not only the Sallyes, but also the Volcae and the Allobroges found themselves obliged to exchange the alliance with the Arverni for the rule of Rome. The octopus was spreading its tentacles. West of the Alps, the Romans organised the territory they had conquered, and called it "the Province," Provincia, the Provence of to-day, otherwise known as Transalpine Gaul, and soon, on account of the town of Narbonne which became its capital, designated the Narbonnaise district.

From this time forward the three provinces of Gaul are found mentioned in Latin literature—Gallia braccata, that is to say the part of Gaul in which the people wore breeches or trousers—Provence; Gallia comata, where they wore their hair long, necessary to secure a market for Italian wine and oil, Rome forbade Transalpine Gaul to cultivate what best suited her soil and climate—the vine and the olive.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Indeed Transalpine Gaul paid a somewhat heavy price for the honour of being admitted into the civilisation of Rome.

Gaul was divided into peoples, or city States, as the Romans called them, which did not agree together, were jealous and quarrelsome, and plundered one another. We have seen that the only common bond between them was the organisation of the Druids with their general councils; but the power of the Druids had gradually declined with the development of feudalism. These divisions resulted in regular wars, with offensive and defensive alliances, strategic campaigns, the capture of strongholds, pillage, murder and robbery, which left bitter hatred in their train. It was rare, said Cæsar, for a year to pass by without a city taking up arms in order to attack a neighbouring city or to resist an attack.

These divisions between the States prevented any national understanding in face of foreign aggression; and this has been brought up against the Gauls. Why did they not form a national federation? They would then have been able to resist the Roman invasion and the incursions of the Germans.

The Gauls would have been able to resist these invasions just as well had they possessed grenades and machine guns. Moral and social discoveries have not been less difficult to make than scientific inventions, and their diffusion has been no less arduous. The growth of modern political ideas has of necessity been slow and gradual, and has been achieved only after many a struggle and effort, and much sullering. Camille Jullian has pointed out that the idea of national unity never occurred to any race of antiquity. Even in France, how many wars, bloody battles and terrible conflicts took place before the south allowed itself to be assimilated by the north. Even on the eve of the Renaissance, Burgundy, as we know, was in alliance with England against the King of France.

In addition to this France was, in reality, practically eighty or a hundred times larger than she is to-day. The extent of a country must be measured by the time taken to establish communications. A distance of forty miles is a short one for a motor car going a hundred miles an hour, it is a very long way for the pedestrian who would require a whole day's march to cover it and in the end would arrive tired out. In those days there were no railways, motor cars, telegraphs, telephones or newspapers to spread ideas, writing was known only to a very small minority, whilst the difficulty of communication and the great distances were increased by huge forests, which very often had to be skirted, by marshes, and by the rarity of bridges over the rivers. The Romans became menacing on the Alpine frontier; but under such conditions how could men's minds be awakened to sentiments of a common nationality of which they had no conception, how could they be aroused to a general call to arms, when the Veneti were in Armorica, the Morini along the northern seaboard, the Treveri beyond the Ardennes and the Carnutes in the district of Chartres?

CELTIC GAUL

The union of the various peoples of Gaul could only have been achieved as it was in Italy by the dominion of one of them over the rest.

Outside the feudal families—the patrician families as the Romans would have called them—there was a fairly numerous crowd of people who were not connected with any clan, the populace of the rural districts, artisans, adventurers, and independent individuals—"the commons," in short. Men of wealth and energy, who had at their disposal those two great levers birth and riches, after having formed the "commons" into groups for their support, succeeded in establishing what the Greeks called tyranny. As "tyrants" they ruled the State. We have already seen how Bituitus was seized by the Romans and how they compelled the surrender of his son. Fifty years later Celtillus, among these same Arverni, again made the attempt, and for a time re-established the supremacy of his people over the neighbouring tribes. The lasting success of his enterprise might have brought about the unification of Gaul, and, through this unification, her independence. But Celtillus was overthrown by a rival faction, by the heads of the patrician families who combined together in horror of tyranny. He perished at the stake; but in the traces of his father's footsteps was to march one of the greatest of men—his son Vercingetorix.

The divisions which separated the Gauls occurred, not only between the various peoples, but also between the different factions in the bosom of a single State. The noble families were, like the Montagues and the Capulets, in a constant state of rivalry and conflict. The head of a clan, in his desire to rule the State, would turn to the populace, the "commons," the mass of rural workers and artisans, who enjoyed the protection of no patron, the malcontents, in fact, and thus roused against him the families organised under the feudal system. A similar conflict occurred again and again in similar circumstances. And thus we find the patricians, when their immemorial power was threatened, soliciting alliance with Rome in order to secure the defeat of a rival, actually becoming her allies, and endeavouring to maintain their existence with the help of the very people who had invaded their territory.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

On the foot of the statue raised to Vercingetorix on the heights of Alise-Sainte-Reine, these words of Cæsar have been engraved : "United, Gaul would have defied the world."

This union, alas ! at the time when Cæsar appeared, was impossible.

As it was, the union of Gaul in the war against the Romans was more complete than the circumstances might have led one to expect. Strabo makes an unexpected but nevertheless an apparently very true remark when he says that the Gauls were quickly subjected because they resisted the Romans in great masses. "The slightest check meant a general defeat." The result of a single campaign, or even of a battle, decided their fate. If the struggle had been broken up and spread over many localities and divided into various episodes, as it was in Spain, where the Iberians "cut up their wars into small and scattered battles, after the fashion of brigands," says Strabo, into guerilla warfare, in which the Romans spent two hundred years before establishing their rule, the Gallic war might have lasted for ever and might even have ended in a very different way.

One last subject to be discussed is that of the population of Gaul on the eve of the Roman conquest. It is generally estimated at five or six million inhabitants; but some historians have placed the figure at ten millions, and others as high as twenty or thirty millions. The most densely populated districts were valleys fertilised by rivers, such as the Seine and the Oise, the Saône and the Loire. It would be as well perhaps not to rely too implicitly on the description given by Cæsar. His wonderful Commentaries, written in the simplest possible language, in order to be accessible to all, were destined for political propaganda.

CELTIC GAUL

It was to the interest of Cæsar to exaggerate the numbers of his vanquished foes.

We must bear in mind the huge spaces that were covered with woods or marshes; more than half of northern Gaul was waste land. Flanders was one vast forest, in which the only clear spaces were quagmires, and wild beasts were the sole inhabitants—"the pitiless forest," as it was still called by the chroniclers of the Middle Ages. It is true that a number of these forests were inhabited. An import trade existed, but it could only contribute in a very small degree to the subsistence of the people. The territory of Gaul, which to-day supports a population of forty-seven or forty-eight million people, could, it would seem, hardly have contained more than twelve or fifteen millions at the time Julius Cæsar was making ready to subjugate it, a figure which is very near to that suggested by Camille Jullian.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Cæsar, Commentaries. Cicero, Pro Fonteio. The Works of Strabo, Ammianus Marcellinus, Diodorus Siculus, Vitruvius, Pliny, Plutarch, in various editions. The Emperor Julian, Complete Works. Letters, edited by J. Bidez, 1924. Alf. Maury, Les Forêts de la Gaule, 1857. Fustel de Coulanges, Hist. des institutions politiques de l'ancienne France, 1875. Bulliot et H. de Fontenay, L'Art de l'émaillerie chez les Éduens, 1875. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Introduction à l'étude de la littérature celtique, 1883. D'Arbois de Jubainville, La Civilisation des Celtes et celle de l'époque homérique, 1899. D'Arbois de Jubainville, Les Celtes depuis les temps les plus anciens, 1904. Meitzen, Siedlung und Agrarwesen der Westgermanen und Ostgermanen, der Kelten . . . 1895. Bertrand, La Religion des Gaulois, 1897. Jacq. Flach, L'Origine historique de l'habitation et des lieux habités en France, 1899. G. Bloch, Les Origines, la Gaule indépendante . . . from Hist. de France, edited by Lavisse, 1901. J. Dechelette, Recherches sur la religion gauloise, 1904. Blanchet, Traité des monnaies gauloises, 1905. G. Dottin, Manuel . . . de l'Antiquité celtique, 1906. Cam. Jullian, Hist. de la Gaule, II, la Gaule indépendante, 1908. [Maxime Petit], Histoire de France illustrée [1909]. Aug. Longnon, Origine et formation de la nationalité française [1912]. Loisy, Essai hist. sur les sacrifices, 1920. Jean Brunhes, Géographie humaine de la France, from Hist. de la nation française, edited by Gabr. Hanotaux [1920]. Imbart de la Tour, Histoire politique des origines à 1515, ibid. [1921].

CHAPTER III

ROMAN GAUL

Cæsar's conquest. The pretexts given—the invasion of Gaul by the Germans of Ariovistus and by the Helvetti. First victories of Cæsar (58 B.C.). The divisions of Gaul—the patriciate and the popular party. The first period of the Gallic Wars (58-55 B.C.). The Gauls not yet aware that their independence is at stake. Second period (54-53 B.C.). Vercingetorix. Defeat of Cæsar before Gergovia. Alise-Sainte-Reine. Conquered Gaul. The task of the conquerors. Gaul subjected to Roman civilisation. The administrative work of the Romans. Rerons of the romanisation of Gaul. Latin Gaul (second century B.C.). The Gall-Roman towns. Paris under the Roman Emperors. The culture of Latin literature—Ausonius. Organisation of the land—the large estate, the villa. Spread of Christianity—its beginnings in Gaul, its development. Persecution. The martyrs of Lyons, Sainte Blandine. Saint Denis and the Martyrs' Mount. The basilicas. The German menace on the Rhine. Invasion of the Cimbri and the Teutons (second century B.C.). Defence of Gaul organised by the Emperors. First appearance of the Alemanni and the Franks. The terrible avalanche of the years 275-276. The Germanic peoples protected and entrusted with the defence of the Empire. Germans established in Gaul by the Romans. Gaul in the fourth century. Saint Martin. Arianism. Its spread. Its importance. The great estates of the fourth century. The colonies.

ABOUT the year 62 B.C. the pressure of the Germans on the Rhine became more and more menacing.

The most important of their nations, the Suevi, occupied Sunbia and Franconia. They rendered obeisance to a certain Ariovistus, a sort of barbarian genius, who lived always under canvas, was greedy for battle, and was Cæsar. carving out a great Empire for himself by the sword. Ariovistus hastened to respond to the appeal of the Sequani, who were established in the present district of Franche-

ROMAN GAUL

Comté, and were impatient of the yoke of the Aedui, the most powerful nation in Gaul since the fall of the Arvernian hegemony.

Ariovistus marched to the help of the Sequani with about 15,000 men, most of them mounted. The Aedui were beaten. They abandoned their territory on the banks of the Saône, which was seized by the Sequani, gave hostages and surrendered to their rivals most of the peoples who had been their clients.

Thanks to a handful of German knights, the hegemony of Gaul had passed into the hands of the Sequani (Besançon).

But Ariovistus aimed at deriving some advantage from his victory. He began by laying claim to Upper Alsace and added it to his empire, which now extended from the Vosges to the Oder. To his summons the most divers peoples from across the Rhine hastened to respond—Harudes, Marcomanni, Triboc and Vangiones. It has been maintained, mistakenly no doubt, that the Teutonic idiom spoken in Alsace to-day dates from this period.

Amongst his allies Ariovistus played the part of a potentate, levying contributions, taking hostages, and dividing among his own followers land confiscated from its owners. The Sequani rebelled; they took up arms, summoned their clients, and a battle took place; they were beaten.

Many years previously the Aedui had concluded a pact of amity with the Romans. Ariovistus and the Sequani had forced them to take an oath not to have recourse to this alliance; but one of their chiefs, a Druid named Divieiaeus, a rich man, of influential family, had refused to take it. He went to Rome, where he continued his intrigues. He showed himself everywhere, anointing Cieero with the unction of his flattery, and hanging on to the white togas of the senators in order to pour into their ears the woes of his fellow citizens.

On their side, a party of the Helvetii, a Gallic nation of Switzerland, in view of the menace from Germany, made up their minds at the instigation of one of their chiefs, a certain Orgetorix, to leave their country, and, following the traditional route of the emigrations, to enter Gaul, and march towards the Atlantic, in order to seize lands. They crossed the Jura, went through the land of the Sequani and arrived among the Aedui, pillaging all the way: The Aedui redoubled their complaints to Rome and the Allobroges joined them.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

A young man, belonging to a patrician family so illustrious that it claimed it had sprung from the loins, if not of Jupiter, at least of Venus, a young man who until that time was hardly known in Rome except for a life of gallantry, extravagant elegance, tasteful luxury and wild prodigality, the young Julius Cæsar, was at that time, as a red-cloaked proconsul, Governor, not only of Illyria, but also of both Gauls, Cisalpine and Transalpine. He was immensely clever, probably the cleverest man that has ever lived, and equally ambitious, vaguely aspiring to the highest destiny. Cæsar saw in the conflict that would be the result of the double invasion of Gaul by the Suevi and the Helvetii the opportunity for a success which would at once raise him head and shoulders above his rivals, mediocre politicians who were tiring Rome by their squabbles and intrigues. The enterprise which Cæsar had planned would secure for him, not only the fabulous halo of some far distant triumph, but also a devoted army and immense resources in money and goods of all kinds.

The Senate hesitated. Cæsar succeeded in convincing it. He assembled the troops placed at his disposal as proconsul in both provinces and set forth in order, as he said, to intervene in favour of the Aedui, the allies of Rome, and protect the Gauls against the Germans. The beginning of the Gallic Wars has been fixed as the 28th of March, 58 B.C.

The Helvetii, to the number of about 400,000, including women and children, had invaded the country of the Aedui, when Cæsar, crossing with his army over the Saint-Bernard pass, engaged in their pursuit, overtook them at Montmort, near Bibracte and not far from Mount Beuvray, and inflicted upon them a total defeat, forcing those who survived to return to their own country.

After this it was necessary for Cæsar to turn against the Suevi, who, under the leadership of Ariovistus, were descending the valley of the Saône, and threatening the Roman province of Cisalpine Gaul. Here, once more, the victory of Cæsar was complete. Ariovistus and his Suevi fled to the Rhine, which the Romans reached at the same time. In the neighbourhood of Bâlc a terrible massacre took place—soldiers, women, children and old men, Cæsar had them all put to the sword. Numbers of Germans were drowned in trying to cross the river. The Teutonic peoples who were waiting on the right bank for an opportunity of crossing in their turn retreated in disorder and were massacred in small parties at a time by the inhabitants of the districts they traversed. Soon afterwards Ariovistus died of wounds. These events took place in the year 58 B.C.

ROMAN GAUL

The Gallic War had been inaugurated, and Cæsar made up his mind not to end it until it had provided his ambition with the pedestal it required. “I waged this war,” he said, “as much in the interests of Gaul as of Rome.” And, indeed, the Gauls did not at first recognise the Romans as enemies, but regarded them rather as allies against the invaders. And even when they did understand that the campaign undertaken by the red-cloaked proconsul would turn to anything but their advantage and that, under pretext of doing them a service, the Romans were only aiming at extending their own Empire, in the majority of the aristocratic cities the rich still declared themselves in favour of Cæsar. Government by an aristocracy represented public liberty in the eyes of the Roman senators, and thus Cæsar, in conquering the Gauls, could pose at Rome as the defender of liberty. The cause of independence in Gaul remained in the hands of the masses, the populace, the “commons,” who followed the voice of any capable man who, moved by the noblest motives or, on the contrary, like Cæsar, following the path of personal ambition, was willing to lead them against the conquerors.

Thus the proud patrician Julius Cæsar treated with disdain the disorderly hordes whom he had to fight—wanderers, outlaws, vagabonds, adventurers, brigands and thieves, as he often called them, adding that these wanderers, adventurers, brigands and thieves had left the cultivation of their fields and their daily toil in order to defend their country, which made them adventurers and brigands of a peculiar type.

The wicked cruelty with which Cæsar stained his glory is in part explained by his fury roused at the resistance offered by this rabble and the checks it inflicted on him.

Thus some peoples, among whom the rule of the aristocracy

THE EARLIEST TIMES

'was undisputed, like the Remi (Rheims) and the Lingones (Langres), remained obstinately attached to Cæsar. Others had a wavering policy, now in favour of alliance with Rome, now on the side of national resistance, according as to whether the patriciate or the "commons" were more powerful in the city. The Aedui occupied a place apart, inasmuch as they succeeded in protecting their own prosperity and power from the storm. They may be compared to the Burgundians in the Middle Ages whose territory they occupied. In the first century b.c. they followed a policy similar to that which was so successful in the case of the subjects of Philip the Bold and Philip the Good during the struggles of the Hundred Years' War.

Thus Gaul was very far from offering united resistance to Rome.

We must bear in mind also the great difference between the Gauls and the Romans in the field of tactics, in military organisation and armament.

For two hundred years the Gauls had scarcely altered their method of fighting, which they still carried on like the primitive warriors of the time of Ambigatus and Sigovesus. To march straight at the enemy without any precaution, without sending scouts ahead or protecting their flanks, without dissimulating their forces, or finding out the strong and weak points of their adversary—such was still their entire tactical method.

They went out to war in large crowds, accompanied by their women and children, and carrying an incredible collection of personal property, plate and utensils of all kinds on interminable files of wagons : and, in spite of all this impedimenta they never succeeded in having enough provisions for a campaign of any duration. How often was not the success of one of their armies ruined from lack of victuals ! Peoples and tribes on the march remained in their separate groups, divided from each other by long intervals. How could military operations be carried out in such conditions ?

The generalissimo, elected at the beginning of the march in a tumultuous assembly, remained virtually dependent on those who had appointed him. Ambiorix told the Romans "the mob has as much power over me as I have over them."

A chieftain, such as Vercingetorix, even if he had thought out

THE EARLIEST TIMES

fellow countrymen the true or false reports and news which the Romans desired to have spread

Cæsar in his Commentaries gives us to understand that it was well nigh impossible for the cause of independence to triumph

After the defeat of Ariovistus, the Aedui imagined they were masters of Gaul, as the Sequani had been before them. But Cæsar was on the watch. He did not divulge his plans, and more than one Gaul allowed himself to be deceived by his assurances. The Aedui and the Remi regarded him as an ally, an ally who began by making sure of the support of the patricians among the Aedui and even of the vergobret himself, as well as of the chiefs of the Sequani. He even did the cavalry of the Aedui the honour of incorporating them with his own legions, and few indeed among the Gauls suspected the hidden designs of the proconsul.

Cæsar decided to begin the conquest of Gaul in the territory of the Belgæ, who, with the Arverni, were everywhere renowned for their martial prowess. Cæsar and Strabo both agree that Belgic Gaul reached as far as the Marne, and point out that of all the Belgæ, the most courageous were the Bellovoës (Beauvais) and the Suessiones (Soissons). When once the Belgæ were subjected, caught between their own territory and Transalpine Gaul, Gaul proper would be at his mercy. The Belgæ seem to have realised the danger. The sacred spirit of independence seems to have breathed within them. Nevertheless one of their peoples, the Remi (Rheims), remained faithful to the alliance made with Rome.

The campaign was a hard one, conducted by Titus Labienus, Cæsar's best lieutenant. It ended, under the command of Cæsar himself, in the bloody defeat of the Nervii (Marnault) on the banks of the Sambre. The victory was so hotly disputed that at one moment Cæsar found himself obliged to fight in the front rank like a common soldier. After this he seized the oppidum (a place of refuge and a fortified centre of supplies) of the Aduatuci, in the valley of the Meuse, and 32,000 Aduatuci were sold by auction, standing with a wooden yoke on their necks and their hands bound behind their backs. Let it not be forgotten that in this war the Romans represented civilisation.

ROMAN GAUL

and the Gauls barbarism. Cæsar crowned his victory by pushing a salient across the Rhine, in order that the Germans might catch a glimpse of the Roman eagles.

The Gallic Wars have been divided into three periods—the first, from 58 to 55 B.C., consisted, on the part of the Gauls, of unorganised efforts, that is to say, devoid of any common plan, some rushing to arms whilst others gave way. The Gauls did not understand, it was as yet impossible for them to understand, that their independence was at stake. Unfortunately, this period was turned to terrible account by the conquerors. The second period, including the years 54 and 53 B.C., was characterised by increasingly important movements in favour of independence and by attempts to realise it on the part of an ever larger number of united peoples. The repeated crimes of the Romans had ended in awaking the national sentiment.

The campaign of the year 56 B.C. consisted of the war in Armorica and Aquitainia. The peoples of the west had risen up under the active and energetic leadership of the Veneti (Vannes). The Veneti were masters of the sea. We have already described their trade with England, and their great ships driven before the wind by means of leather sails.

Cæsar and his lieutenant Brutus accomplished an astounding feat in improvising a fleet to fight the Veneti on their own element. Cæsar sent for oarsmen from Provence, and found auxiliaries among the Aquitanian Celts of Saintonge and La Vendée, whom an ancient feud made the envious rivals of the Veneti. Brutus invented great hooked knives modelled on the mural hooks, with which the Romans undermined the base of the ramparts they were besieging. By means of these hooks, he succeeded in cutting the ropes which fastened the sails to the masts of the enemy's ships, and made them fall flat on deck. The heavy vessels, with their high prows, found they could not move, whilst the oarsmen from Provence could manœuvre the Roman boats at will. Cæsar's triumph was complete. There was a great massacre, and the survivors were taken prisoner. The Veneti had fought a noble fight for the greatest of causes. They never submitted to Rome, but Cæsar called their attempt to safeguard the freedom of their country "rebellion," and, Regency had similar dreams about the Mississippi. The conquerors set forth not only in ships of war carrying arms, balistas, onagers and stones, but also in trading vessels which they were doubtless to bring back filled with the most marvellous treasures. The lieutenants, the stewards, the inspectors and the minions of Cæsar, anxious to dazzle Rome by their luxury, and to enlarge and embellish their villas in the Campagna, had surrounded themselves with merchants of every description, in anticipation of the pearls, the metals, the slaves, the great hunting dogs and other even more precious and magnificent treasures of which they had but a vague idea.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This was the period when Rome amassed untold treasures. Her armies were covering themselves with glory in the East as well as in Gaul. It was a time of unbridled luxury for which Cæsar set the example; precious furniture, statues by the greatest artists, celebrated pictures, brilliant mosaics, strange and rare ornaments, gold and silver plate, Cæsar bought everything from every quarter. Suetonius says that in Gaul Cæsar "more often destroyed towns for the sake of pillage (ob prædam) than as punishment for some crime." He filled the temples of Rome with votive offerings stolen from the sanctuaries of the Gauls in order to magnify himself in the eyes of the Romans; in Italy and the provinces he sold gold by weight, at the rate of 300 sesterces to the pound. At his own expense, that is to say at the expense of the Gauls, he undertook the construction in Rome of a new forum, in which he hoped to see his own fortunes flourish, and the cost of which was estimated at 60 million sesterces. He lent money to anybody—the agents and servile heralds of his glory. "He subjugated the Gauls by the Roman armies," says Plutarch, "and the Romans by Gallie gold." He lent money to Cicero, the prating orator; he took Cicero's brother Quintus with him as his legate on the expedition to pillage Great Britain. Whereupon Cicero, who for the time being was very much concerned with the spoils that might be won in those islands, set to work with unparalleled conviction to sing the glory of the conqueror of Gaul and of Great Britain, and as his prose, flowing though it was, seemed to him inadequate, he added verse. Catullus too wrote verses, also about Cæsar, and they were better than Cicero's:

ROMAN GAUL

To CÆSAR

“ Debauchee, spendthrift and robber ! who lettest thy favourite devour the treasures of the long-haired Gauls and far away Britain ! Cæsar ! the vilest of the Romans ! Debauchee, spendthrift and robber ! Thy favourites strut about and wallow in wealth. Cæsar, the greatest debauchee of Rome ! Thou free liver, spendthrift and robber ! Oh general most rare ! thou didst go to the most distant isles of the west, with thine infamous minions, only to devour hundreds of millions ! ”

With Cæsar's fifth campaign, marked by the second Belgic War (54 B.C.), we enter upon the second period of the Gallic Wars, in which the Gauls, who had been outraged for four years, deceived, robbed, put to the sword or sold into slavery, during one of the most hateful periods in the history of the human race, began to unite, as far as it was possible at this epoch, for the deliverance of their country.

Before his second expedition to Great Britain, Cæsar had had some warning as to this possibility in the conduct of Dumnorix, an Aeduan noble, the younger brother of that Diviciacus, whom we have already mentioned as importuning the Senate, and son-in-law of Orgetorix, the Helvetian, whom he had expelled during the exodus of 58 B.C. Dumnorix had in him the makings of a leader of the people and of a war-chief. Immensely rich, he was followed by a large band of cavalry, whom he supported at his own expense. His attitude, moreover, had been vague, like that of the nation to which he belonged. Declaring allegiance to Rome, he served Cæsar, but only to betray him; then he returned to him again for some low service. Dumnorix was one of those men who possess clearness of vision and noble aspirations, but whose characters are not as lofty as their designs, which are little more than intangible dreams—characters so vividly portrayed by Shakespeare in Hamlet and by Musset in Lorenzaccio. He made moving speeches about the fair independence of Gaul, but without having the necessary force of character to gather any large body of revolutionaries around him. Cæsar, put on his guard, attached him to his suite, and in order not to leave him behind in Gaul, wanted to take him to Great Britain. Dumnonix pretended that he suffered from sea-sickness and that his religious convictions forbade him from taking part in any hostilities against the country of the Druids. Meanwhile he left no stone unturned to spread among the Gallie chiefs who were to accompany Cæsar all manner of ideas calculated to win them over to the cause of independence. As the proconsul was on the point of embarking, Dumnonix suddenly left the camp with his followers. Pursued by Cæsar's cavalry, the noble Gaul died bravely. "I die a free man, the citizen of a free nation," were his last words.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Cæsar's rapid conquests resulted, and could not fail to result, in a merely superficial settlement. A few districts, such as that of the Veneti, where everything had been devastated and the population put to the sword or sold into slavery, might have been described as pacified; but in the others hatred and rebellion simmered. M. G. Bloch points out in a very interesting way how the Roman rule, by placing all the nations of Gaul under the same yoke, had destroyed the struggle for hegemony which had armed the various peoples one against the other, so that the road was now opened for union in the sacred cause of independence.

On his return from Great Britain to the continent, Cæsar found the great countries of Gaul, which, in his own famous words, he thought he had reduced to silence, in a state of fermentation. The disaster inflicted by Ambiorix, the chief of the Eburones (valley of the Meuse), on the legions of Sabinus fell like a thunderbolt.

Ambiorix was one of the most interesting figures of his time; despising the refinement and luxury of a civilisation in which he took no interest, he lived on his farm on the edge of the woods, supervising the work on it, hunting in the forest, and loving the open air, the woods and freedom. He was endowed with rare qualities as a soldier, being full of guile and with a genius for planning ambuscades. In his sullen and bitter hatred of the Romans, he pretended to be their friend in order the better to be able to cut their throats. Sabinus, Cæsar's lieutenant in the north-eastern cantons, fell into the trap. He was routed by the Eburones, and massacred together with all his legion. Quintus Cicero, who happened to be in the neighbourhood with his troops, succeeded in saving the remains of the vanquished army. He rallied it together and shut himself up in a huge camp fortified in the usual Roman way. In vain did the Eburones, who had been reinforced by the Menapii and the Nervii, endeavour to take the entrenchments by assault. Cæsar came up with his customary speed, and succeeded in raising the siege. But the repercussion of this event was felt throughout Gaul. The Carnutes (Chartres and Orléans) and the Senones (Sens) massacred or drove out the chiefs who had been placed over them by the Roman faction. Cæsar took a high hand; he gave up his visit to Italy and increased his army to ten legions. The Aedui (Autun) and the Remi (Rheims) remained subject to Rome and by means of garrisons cleverly dispersed throughout the various States the general upheaval was averted. The Belgæ took up arms. Ambiorix, of the Eburones, and Indutiomarus, of the Treviri, were their brave and determined leaders; but against the organisation of the Roman army, under the direction of the genius of Cæsar, any local effort in one of these regions of Gaul was doomed to failure. The ravaging of several Belgic cantons by the Romans was terrible. As Ambiorix and his Eburones had beaten the Romans, Cæsar describes them in his book as "scoundrels," and these "scoundrels" had to be punished in an exemplary manner. The Romans cut down the standing corn, delivered up the villages to the flames, and put women and children to the sword, whilst the old men perished under the most terrible tortures. Terrified, the Carnutes and the Senones begged for mercy from the conqueror. Indutiomarus had fallen in battle against the legionaries of Labienus, but it was Ambiorix whom Cæsar had set his heart on capturing. Cæsar would tolerate no resistance on the part of his adversaries; victory above all was not allowed. With the help of his supporters, his spies and the agents whom he kept in the country, he organised a savage, minute and clever manhunt. Sometimes Ambiorix was seen fleeing in the distance; Cæsar or his lieutenants would send their cavalry in pursuit; but Ambiorix knew all the features of the country better than they did. In order to lay hands on his hated foe, Cæsar lowered himself so far as to turn for help to the Germans. Ambiorix was supported by four faithful companions, energetic, ardent and swift as himself. In a few weeks he and his heroic little escort became, as it were, the heroes of legend. They were seen everywhere at once and the Romans were maddened by their endless efforts to catch them without success. These comings and goings, marches and countermarches, criss-crossing each other in every direction, were not, of course, undertaken without the inevitable slaughter, pillage, burning and devastation. The faithful Hirtius writes in this connection: "Despairing of getting his fugitive and trembling [sic] foe (Ambiorix) into his power, Cæsar thought his dignity [sic] demanded the destruction in the States belonging to Ambiorix of men, cattle and buildings, so that, an object of horror to those whom chance had spared, Ambiorix might never return to a country upon which he had drawn down such disasters" "Everything," adds Hirtius, "was destroyed by murder, fire and rapine." The whole proceeding was base and cruel beyond description. Finally it became necessary for the Romans to evacuate territory which they had so thoroughly ravaged that they could not live in it themselves, and Cæsar brought back his soldiers to Rheims and the Remi, his faithful friends (Sept. 54 b.c.).

ROMAN GAUL

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Here another picture was unveiled.

At Rheims, before the representatives of Gaul, Cæsar discoursed on the rebellion of the Senones and the Carnutes. He condemned Aego to death, one of the leaders of the Senones, who was regarded as the soul of the movement of independence. Cæsar insisted upon death by flogging, as though he were some low deserter from his legions. For was not a noble Gaul, who desired the freedom of his country, a deserter from the cause of Rome? Others of the accused, who had escaped this dread penalty by taking flight, were ordered by the proconsul to be forbidden "water and fire." By this treatment at the hands of the stranger the Gauls tasted the lowest depths of slavery. As for the conqueror, he was once more able to announce to the Roman Senate "that Gaul had been reduced to silence."

This proud proclamation was made at a moment when Gaul was about to make her voice heard, and this time with a magnificence and splendour which would put the glory of the victor for ever in the shade.

A rapid glance at the five years that had just passed showed the Gauls what the help brought to them by Cæsar had cost. The aristocracy of the country had summoned him and welcomed him, and Cæsar had not hesitated, in the interests of his own policy, to put tyrants over them—tyrants whom they abhorred. Whole senates had been massacred or reduced to servitude; the “chiefs” of the country had been dragged by Cæsar in his train, as pitiful hostages, treated as slaves who were too untrustworthy not to be bound hand and foot.

ROMAN GAUL

What had become of the fine cavalry which was the pride of Gaul? Cæsar had sent it to Great Britain or to the Rhine. The auxiliaries which the proconsul raised in Gaul were systematically placed in the most dangerous positions in battle, wherever the slaughter was greatest, for he was always anxious to spare his legions. His procurators and foragers stripped the country bare in order to meet the needs of the army; Latin merchants and speculators swooped down upon the towns and estates like a cloud of hungry sparrows on to fields sown with corn, and Cæsar’s lieutenants, not to mention Cæsar himself, set them the example of how to make a clean sweep of everything. At the assizes held in Rheims shortly before, an assembly of Gauls was forced to pass sentence at the dictates of the master. The mockery of freedom which remained to Gaul was laid bare in this lurid light.

Vereingetorix! At this great and sonorous name the soul of a Frenchman still leaps after two thousand years. “Vereingetorix” was a proper name, well suited to the hero; it meant in the Celtie language “great king of warriors,” and this name, which has re-echoed, and will ever re-echo, down the ages, was already as resplendent as a standard, as a call to arms. “It seemed made to inspire terror,” says the historian Florus.

Vereingetorix was the son of Celillus, King of the Arverni, whom the patrician faction had burnt at the stake. His son had grown up with the desire of vengeance in his heart, and when he saw his country enslaved by the enemy, his hatred burnt even more fiercely against the foreign oppressor than against those who, as unconscious instruments of the latter, had been the aiders and abettors of his father’s death.

Vercingetorix was young, ardent, rich, handsome, tall and strong He had a numerous following He is usually represented with long drooping moustaches, but the coins struck in his image show him with long hair and the face entirely clean shaven He was one of those men whom it is an honour to meet, in whom Nature seems to have achieved a masterpiece, not so rare as might be supposed, but who rise to eminence but rarely, since neither men nor circumstances conspire to make their value felt Their strength of character, firm and lofty convictions, fine generosity and nobility of spirit shine out all the more resplendent because those connected with their history, beginning with their illustrious foe, display a niggardly, shrivelled spirit, with a selfish outlook. Nevertheless Cæsar, so little able to understand him, was bound in his Commentaries to bow before him "Vereingetorix," he writes, "never took up arms for his own personal interests, but for the liberty of all"

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Vereingetorix not only possessed the gift of command, he was also eloquent, persuasively, irresistibly eloquent He had the power of pleasing the masses, though it was by means of manly virtues, with which was mingled that curious charm peculiar to leaders of men

Under his guidance the resistance of Gaul took on a different character It no longer consisted of unskilled marches, and simple minded and primitive forms of attack Vereingetorix had studied Cæsar and his soldiers, he had also studied his own countrymen With wonderful versatility of intellect, an abundance of moral resource and incomparable scope of imagination, he was destined to make the Roman leader tremble

Cæsar was master of his army, a single word from him—less than a word, a gesture, a nod of the head—and as one in the legions would get into motion, manoeuvre, fight or halt with all the precision of clockwork "The legions," said Cæsar, "show what the discipline of the Roman State can accomplish" But Vereingetorix had to reckon with his followers, to discuss with them, submit his plans to them and have them approved, not only by the council, but by the mass of the soldiers in arms, he had to struggle to secure the support of his allies, who, at the slightest reverse, threatened to abandon him Throughout the whole of the war in which he commanded he had beside him supporters who thought of nothing else than how to give him a blow in the back.

R O M A N G A U L

“Vercingetorix,” writes Fustel de Coulanges, “did not have at his disposal the one prerequisite for all great wars—he was not in command of a united nation. The divisions which exist in society are also to be found in armies, and their counterpart in the heart of the soldier is indecision, lack of discipline, doubt and distrust. In vain did Vercingetorix collect a large army, for however great his own energy, genius and personal valour may have been, he seems never to have succeeded in endowing that army with the organisation and cohesion necessary to face the Roman legions.”

In the accomplishment of the great task for which he had opened his heart, he had in his own country, in his own city, his own family, enemies who would not lay down their arms, who hampered his efforts, thwarted his plans and betrayed him to the foe. His uncle Gobannitio and the chiefs of the Arverni, infeoffed to the aristocratic party, and devoted to Rome, the masters of Gergovia kept watch over him, and would fain have put him in chains.

The exact strength of Vercingetorix’s forces was always known to Cæsar by means of deserters, his very words were reported by traitors; very often, sometimes every day, the proconsul was told what his smallest movements would be.

Before coming to active measures, Vercingetorix had allowed his plans to mature for a long time; he had made them with care, and had surrounded himself with auxiliaries and allies judiciously chosen; the conspiracy remained secret. Cæsar was in Italy watching over his own interests and his political career when the insurrectionary movement broke out, as had been arranged, in the district of the Carnutes.

On a fine January morning (52 B.C.) Gutratus and Conconnetodumnus, two of the bravest and most resolute confederates of the Arvernian chieftain, penetrated into Orleans at the head of a well-armed band of men. From the beginning of the rebellion, Gutratus was the terror of the Romans; from the very first days he assumed superhuman proportions in their imagination, and they regarded him as a sort of exterminating monster spreading fear and death wherever he went. The Roman merchants established in the town, who were even more hated than the soldiers on account of their nefarious dealings and their eagerness to found fortunes on the misery and sufferings of the conquered, had their throats cut in a trice. Amongst them perished Cita, the real head of Cæsar's commissariat. The Carnutes and the Arverni had learnt to unite; the first promoters of the movement, they remained its heart and soul.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The news of the morning's events in Orleans spread like wildfire. Heralds had been posted in relays at various points, and by means of this organisation which was surprisingly swift, Vereingetorix was informed of the result that same evening at Gergovia in Auvergne. He called his clients to arms, but from the first moment the obstacles which were to bar his road rose up before him. His uncle Gobannitio and the patricians would not support the cause of liberty, but drove the hero out of the town. He became a fugitive. Who was the leader of this great people fighting for their freedom? A fugitive, an exile!

It would be as well to enumerate the peoples who took part in the war of independence which we may call the war of Vereingetorix. They were the Arverni (Auvergne) and the Carnutes (the district of Chartres and Orleans) who were the originators, and were joined without delay by the Parisii, the Senones (Sens), the Aulerei (Maine), the Lemovices (Limoges), the Turoni (Tours), the Andecavi (Angers), and the peoples belonging to the confederation of the Armorici, in both peninsulas and along the coast, between the mouths of the Seine and the Loire. The Pictones (Poitou) also joined the movement, but only partially, their capital Limonum (Poitiers) remaining true to the Roman cause.

South of Auvergne, the Nitiobriges (Agenais), the Gabali (Gévaudan), and those of the Ruteni (Rouergue) who had not been swallowed up in the Provincia Romana gave their help, drawn in by the Cadurei (Quercy), who were the resolute agents of national independence in these cantons. The other peoples of this district were forced to be prudent on account of the vicinity of the Provincia Romana.

Belie Gaul had been decimated and ravaged by the last war and, in a state of constant fear of German pressure from across the Rhine, could only come to a tardy and partial decision.

ROMAN GAUL

The Bellovaci (Beauvaisis) pronounced against Rome but would not follow Vercingetorix. The Remi (Rheims) and the Lingones (Langres) declared in favour of the Romans. "Among these two peoples," writes Jullian, "hatred of independence had been raised to a virtue." The Aedui (Burgundy) continued to waver between one side and the other. The Santones (Saintonge) declared for the Romans. The Aquitani (Gascony) remained neutral. Lastly the Narbonnaise was for Cæsar and the Allobroges (Dauphiny) seemed to have resigned themselves to the suzerainty of Rome.

Thus Vercingetorix was very far from having the whole of Gaul on his side; he had barely a third of it—generally speaking the part corresponding to the north-east and the centre of France, Celtic Gaul properly so-called.

Even in that part of Gaul which supported the cause of independence the aristocratic faction continued to show indifference, not to say hostility, towards the young patrician who had been saluted as king by the popular elements of Auvergne; they were always ready to betray him and did indeed often do so.

Excluding the Belgæ, the Armorici and the Aquitani, and not taking the Narbonnaise into account, Gaul was divided into two great confederations, the one following the Arverni (Auvergne) and the other the Aedui (Burgundy); a division, as Jullian points out, similar to that which had divided Greece between Athens and Sparta, and France in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries between the Armagnacs and the Burgundians. And in each State this division was reproduced again. The city States which followed the lead of the Arverni also provided followers for the Aedui, and vice versa.

The Aedui represented the patrician party, the meliores, equivalent to the Armagnacs of the end of the fourteenth century; the Arverni, the popular party, the minores, like the Burgundians of later days, the popular party with its "tyrants" and its impetuous mobs. But, unlike the struggle against England, it was the democrats who represented the national party in the fight against Rome.

In the war he had undertaken, Vercingetorix no doubt disposed of superior numbers to Cæsar, but the difference was merchants established in the town, who were even more hated than the soldiers on account of their nefarious dealings and their eagerness to found fortunes on the misery and sufferings of the conquered, had their throats cut in a trice. Amongst them perished Cita, the real head of Caesar's commissariat. The Carnutes and the Arverni had learnt to unite; the first promoters of the movement, they remained its heart and soul.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The news of the morning's events in Orleans spread like wildfire. Heralds had been posted in relays at various points, and by means of this organisation which was surprisingly swift, Vercingetorix was informed of the result that same evening at Gergovia in Auvergne. He called his clients to arms, but from the first moment the obstacles which were to bar his road rose up before him. His uncle Gobannitio and the patricians would not support the cause of liberty, but drove the hero out of the town. He became a fugitive. Who was the leader of this great people fighting for their freedom? A fugitive, an exile!

It would be as well to ennumerate the peoples who took part in the war of independence which we may call the war of Vercingetorix. They were the Arverni (Auvergne) and the Carnutes (the district of Chartres and Orleans) who were the originators, and were joined without delay by the Parisii, the Senones (Sens), the Aulerci (Maine), the Lemovices (Limoges), the Turoni (Tours), the Andecavi (Angers), and the peoples belonging to the confederation of the Armorici, in both peninsulas and along the coast, between the mouths of the Seine and the Loire. The Pictones (Poitou) also joined the movement, but only partially, their capital Limonum (Poitiers) remaining true to the Roman cause.

South of Auvergne, the Nitiobriges (Agenais), the Gabali (Gévaudan), and those of the Ruteni (Rouergue) who had not been swallowed up in the Provincia Romana gave their help, drawn in by the Cadurei (Quercy), who were the resolute agents of national independence in these cantons. The other peoples of this district were forced to be prudent on account of the vicinity of the Provincia Romana.

Belie Gaul had been decimated and ravaged by the last war and, in a state of constant fear of German pressure from across the Rhine, could only come to a tardy and partial decision.

ROMAN GAUL

The Bellovaci (Beauvaisis) pronounced against Rome but would not follow Vercingetorix. The Remi (Rheims) and the Lingones (Langres) declared in favour of the Romans. "Among these two peoples," writes Jullian, "hatred of independence had been raised to a virtue." The Aedui (Burgundy) continued to waver between one side and the other. The Santones (Saintonge) declared for the Romans. The Aquitani (Gascony) remained neutral. Lastly the Narbonnaise was for Cæsar and the Allobroges (Dauphiny) seemed to have resigned themselves to the suzerainty of Rome.

Thus Vercingetorix was very far from having the whole of Gaul on his side; he had barely a third of it—generally speaking the part corresponding to the north-east and the centre of France, Celtic Gaul properly so-called.

Even in that part of Gaul which supported the cause of independence the aristocratic faction continued to show indifference, not to say hostility, towards the young patrician who had been saluted as king by the popular elements of Auvergne; they were always ready to betray him and did indeed often do so.

Excluding the Belgæ, the Armorici and the Aquitani, and not taking the Narbonnaise into account, Gaul was divided into two great confederations, the one following the Arverni (Auvergne) and the other the Aedui (Burgundy); a division, as Jullian points out, similar to that which had divided Greece between Athens and Sparta, and France in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries between the Armagnacs and the Burgundians. And in each State this division was reproduced again. The city States which followed the lead of the Arverni also provided followers for the Aedui, and vice versa.

The Aedui represented the patrician party, the meliores, equivalent to the Armagnacs of the end of the fourteenth century; the Arverni, the popular party, the minores, like the Burgundians of later days, the popular party with its "tyrants" and its impetuous mobs. But, unlike the struggle against England, it was the democrats who represented the national party in the fight against Rome.

In the war he had undertaken, Vercingetorix no doubt disposed of superior numbers to Cæsar, but the difference was the foe? To the appeal of his own folk he could not turn a deaf ear.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Thus a road was opened between Cæsar and his legions in the north. With his customary clearness of vision and rapidity of decision and movement, Cæsar took it. Through the territory of the wavering Aedui and the friendly Lingones, he rejoined the main body of his troops in the north, and quickly appeared in the neighbourhood of Sens with his ten legions, his whole army being now reunited under his own expert guidance. The plan so finely conceived by Vercingetorix, and which from the very beginning would have secured his final success, had been destroyed. The mistake the young Arvernian had made was forced upon him by the lack of unity in his own country.

And now the two generals had come to grips, each at the head of his army. Vercingetorix failed in his attack on the fortified strongholds. He had neither the knowledge nor the equipment for siege warfare. "The Gauls," said Cæsar, "surround a place with all their forces, hurl stones at the ramparts to put the defenders to flight, and then, covering themselves with their shields, make for the gates and sap the walls." A very primitive proceeding! In the capturing of towns, by means of poliorcetics and ingenious appliances, Cæsar, on the other hand, succeeded almost without striking a blow.

In a pitched battle, the exact site of which has never been determined, the Gallie army suffered a serious check, and Vercingetorix learnt to understand that in a war of sieges and pitched battles he would never be able to get the better of his enemy. Against his sounder instincts, which were always in favour of courage and open attack, he conceived a new plan, and by his energy and conviction succeeded in imposing it upon his council and his army.

Cæsar himself copied the designs of the young Arvernian chief, going so far as to use the very terms the latter would have employed to make his allies in the war adopt them. "Let us change our tactics," he said; "no more battles in open country. Let us aim at depriving the enemy of food and supplies. Our large force of cavalry can easily accomplish this task. Crops must be destroyed, farms stripped bare, villages set on fire. Thus day by day we shall gradually destroy a famished army."

ROMAN GAUL

seeking for its daily bread, in isolated detachments which we shall take by surprise and put out of action separately. We must ruin the towns in which the enemy might find shelter, with the exception of fortresses built on a height and considered impregnable."

This terrible programme was adopted, and it was immediately put into execution with a savage, almost sublime ferocity. In the very centre of Berry twenty villages and towns were burnt to the ground in a single day.

Alas ! Vercingetorix allowed himself to be moved by the Bituriges, who implored him at least to spare their capital, Bourges, Avaricum, the most beautiful city in Gaul, says Cæsar. The Bituriges had only joined the cause of independence with some hesitation, and Vercingetorix was afraid they might desert it, if too great a sacrifice were demanded of them. It was always the same fear of disunion and defection which made the young chieftain flinch in the execution of his best laid plans. The Bituriges, moreover, promised to defend their city resolutely, and they kept their word when Cæsar had surrounded them with his army.

The siege began, harsh and inexorable. The Romans constructed their siege towers with their leather revettings; the besieged set fire to them. Clever at mining and forging, the Bituriges multiplied their means of defence. They caught the siege hooks with which the Romans tried to undermine the ramparts in nets; they countermined their mines; they met the attacking towers with defence towers of equal height. They passed along red hot balls of pitch in metal containers from hand to hand; the last man in the chain, standing erect on the ramparts, would throw the burning shell on to the wooden buildings of the besiegers. But no sooner had he appeared and hurled the burning pitch, than he fell, striken down by the Romans. It meant certain death, and yet not for one instant was the post allowed to remain empty. The siege lasted twenty-seven days, and the town was taken in a heavy thunderstorm which spoilt the defence. The massacre which followed was terrible, truly Roman and truly Cæsarian, the whole garrison being annihilated. It was an outrageous murder of 40,000 human beings. Women shrieked and hugged their babies to

THE EARLIEST TIMES

of the despot, the destroyer of fruitful initiative, at the mercy of corrupt foreigners?

In the northern districts, the skilful Labienus, who had been separated from Cæsar since the defeat of Gergovia, was marching against Lutetia, the capital of the Parisi, which seemed to be the key to the basin of the Seine. The Parisi were ready for the fight. They had chosen as their chief a veteran of previous wars, Camulogenus of the Aulerci. Camulogenus no longer possessed the spirit, the strength or the youthful endurance which the Gauls loved, but his experience of military matters inspired confidence. Labienus, with four legions, had posted himself on the right bank of the Seine, on the spot where the eastern wing of the Louvre and Saint Germain-l'Auxerrois now stand. Camulogenus had taken up a position on Mt. Sainte-Geneviève. The engagement took place on the plain of Grenelle. The left wing of the Gauls was driven back at the first encounter, but the centre and right wing, under the command of Camulogenus himself, resisted without yielding a foot. The Parisi engaged were killed to the last man and their old and valiant leader, Camulogenus of the Aulerci, fell in their midst.

Nevertheless the situation of Cæsar remained critical. Verengetorix had returned with pitiless severity to the strategy of the campaign of Avaricum—the burning of farms, the destruction of forage depots, avoiding pitched battles and preventing the enemy from receiving supplies by lying in ambush for his convoys and destroying them—in short, by starving the foe and putting his bases out of action.

And now, quitting the jungles of the Ardennes, Ambiorix once more appeared, savage and redoubtable.

The tribes of the north joined the movement, the Morini (Flanders), the Nervii (Hainault), the Ambianes (Picardy) and the Atrebates (Artois) in answer to the call of one of the most extraordinary personages of the time—Commius of the Atrebates.

Until the year 53 B.C., the war having then lasted five years, Commius was acting in Belgic Gaul as the agent of Cæsar, to whom he was apparently devoted. Was he one of those men who in the depths of their heart bear an indomitable love for the freedom of their country and wish to begin by studying the enemy in every nook and corner in order the better to fight him later on? At all events he was suddenly found showing himself in a hundred different places, rousing the sluggards, exhorting the wavering, and the insurrection let loose by him was animated by his devouring activity, his rare energy and indomitable courage. Thanks to him, even the Bellovaci ended by sending a few men to the league. But, even more serious for Cæsar than the rising of the tribes in the north was the victorious thrust of the patriots in the south, in their attack on the peoples of the Roman province of Transalpine Gaul; the Arverni and the Gabali had hurled themselves against the Helvii (Vivarais), and the Ruteni and the Cadurei had attacked the Voleae Arceomiei. The Allobroges, aroused by the emissaries of Vercingetorix, seemed to be wavering. Cæsar, fearing to find his communications with Italy cut off, decided to retreat.

ROMAN GAUL

He crossed the country of the faithful Lingones and that of the Sequani (Franche-Comté), who had given but faint-hearted support to the national movement, and reached the cantons of the Allobroges, who were hesitating but had not yet openly declared themselves. On gaining the Narbonnaise, he reorganised his forces and awaited a favourable opportunity for renewing the attack.

What could have passed through the mind of Vercingetorix at this juncture when the situation must have seemed so favourable to him? What arguments could have led him to abandon the plan he was following and the success of which seemed certain? Did he yield to his Gallic temperament, always eager for action and battle? Did he think that victory without a victory was unworthy of him and of the name he bore, unworthy of the people who had placed him at their head and of the sacred cause of which he was the responsible champion? Did he imagine he was certain of victory if he fell upon Cæsar in his retreat, where he was hampered by impedimenta and baggage of all kinds?

Or was the reason for his decision to be found rather in the perfidious conduct of the Aeduan chiefs, embittered by the humiliation they had suffered at the hands of the assembly of Bibraete which had placed them under the command of the Ah, proud civilisation of Rome, thou foster mother of Gaul regenerated, what hymn could be sweet enough to sing in thy honour?

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The name of Gutratius, which, together with those of Vercingetorix, Ambiorix, Lueterius the Cardueian and Commius of the Atrebates, was one of the five most glorious in the war of independence, was doubtless but a surname "Gutratius" is the Celtic for "priest in the service of the god" Like the famous Archbishop of the Hundred Years' War, he may possibly have held some religious office, or he might even have been a Druid who offered sacrifice to the gods.

The capture of Vercingetorix did not put an end to the struggle for independence Cæsar distributed his legates over the various provinces and inaugurated a new system, one of clemency, nay even of favour and consideration towards those who decided to submit, and of extreme severity towards the "rebels" This severity generally consisted in cutting off the right hand of any Gaul criminal enough to lose the liberty of his country, and sending him forth carrying his right hand in his left, to show it to the various peoples who were still unsubjugated, and thus teach them what it meant not to love Rome and allow themselves to be pillaged by her glorious representatives Bands of these unfortunate creatures might be seen wandering about, dying of gangrene and exhaustion along the roads or on the edge of the woods. Terrorisation and clemency combined had their effect, but the name of Vercingetorix continued to shine in men's minds. The Aedui submitted, but many others continued to resist. The Bellovaci had hesitated to take part in the struggle. The patricians were for Rome, but the people rose up at the voice of an ardent leader, Correus of the Bellovaci, and the Senate was obliged to yield. The brave peoples of the Treviri, who had been forced to maintain lutherto by the menace from Germany, also joined in the war against Rome. From the virgin forests of the Ardeunes, Ambiorix once more emerged, and his indomitable energy and prodigious activity were displayed now among the Bellovaci, now among the Treviri, spreading the sacred fire. At the voice of Commius of the Atrebates, the Aulerca (Aureux and Maine) also rose up. Dumnacus, Drappes the Senonian became Romanised in their urban centres, their villas, and in their courts of rhetoric, with regard for nothing but foreign traditions, the people remained the people, cut off from all touch with civilisation, but remaining true to itself, keeping its strength and energy intact. In this Christianity which addressed itself to the soul of the masses with a fulness, a freshness and a simplicity which from the very beginning made it welcomed and understood—ah! the lovely breath of pure fresh air!—in this guise so different and unexpected that it was unrecognised, there was nevertheless born again in all its greatness and generosity the popular soul of Vereingetorix inspiring the heart of France to beat once more.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

It has been regarded as surprising that Gaul should so easily have accepted the rule of conquerors who had made her suffer so terribly. It seemed a sudden change. Cæsar, with his activity, his subtlety and charm, as well as by the prestige his victories had given him, was the first to contribute to it. He had planned a civil war in order to make himself all powerful, and it was important for him to have both the Gauls on his side.

Labienus, who had been Cæsar's favourite lieutenant, his right hand in Gaul, joined the side of Pompey; the Gauls supported Cæsar. After having "pacified" them by violence, Cæsar scourged Gaul, heaping favours on his adherents. In the Narbonnaise he formed his famous legion of Larks, called after the bird so common in the fields of Gaul; an occasion which was marked by the promise of Roman citizenship to several thousands of Gauls; and this process of naturalisation continued to increase. Cæsar even went so far as to give certain Gauls seats in the Senate. His fellow citizens made fun of them when in Rome the newcomers with heavy tread and outlandish accent asked the way to the Curia.

The Romans were even driven to the conclusion that in his anxiety to win the good graces of his late adversaries Cæsar went a little too far. Was he not Gallicising Rome rather than Romanising Gaul? "From the Alpæ peaks, the friend of the Gauls (Cæsar) has let loose the fury of the Celts." Cicero was no longer pleased. Gaul had sent orators to Rome who could make longer speeches than he could. "Adieu to Latin urbanity," he groaned, " adieu to our fine and polished wit ! The breeches of the Gauls—once more—invade our tribunals ! "

ROMAN GAUL

Cæsar and his legions once satiated, Rome took care not to hinder the assimilation of the conquered. To make a vanquished nation resemble the victor is a modern idea. The boundaries of the Gallic "cities," as fixed by the Romans, coincided with those of the territories of the various peoples whom Cæsar had found already established in the country. The Romans left them their ancient names, and later on Christianity adopted the same divisions for its bishoprics, which survived with but insignificant differences almost as late as 1789, and more than one of the departments of France possesses the same boundaries to this day.

Gaul was annexed to the Empire. She gave up her religion, her language and her customs, at all events among the upper classes. For the unwritten law, under which the tribes had lived, Roman law was substituted. For Gallic feudalism, like mediæval feudalism, knew only the law of custom under which the suzerain was the judge of his vassals, the father-master of his family. The clan system was to all appearance abolished in favour of a magistrate sitting in his tribunal. Women and children won a measure of freedom and the ties of the clients were relaxed; but Roman law in Gaul was harsher to the lower classes. Nevertheless it must not be imagined that the country was fundamentally Romanised. Fustel de Coulanges goes much too far in the conclusions he draws. We are more in agreement with Kurth, who maintains that Celtic customs survived among the populace. This is a very important fact, for the seed of French history lies hidden within it. "Nowhere," says Kurth, "even in the best-governed districts, was the assimilation complete at the time when the final crisis broke out."

Among the people the Celtic language survived, and the great mass of the nation still spoke it when the German kingdoms were founded. Some historians are even of opinion that the Bagaudæ, those thousands and thousands of rustic rebels, who were free men and Roman citizens, still spoke Celtic at the end of the third century. In Bordeaux, where the culture of Latin letters was then at the height of its glory, the family of Ausonius, the greatest Latin poet of the period, still spoke Celtic at home (fourth century). The Treviri were considered one of the most completely Romanised of all the Gallic peoples, Trèves having become a sort of second Latin capital; and yet the people of that city still spoke Celtic, according to St. Jerome, at the end of the fourth century and the Arverni still spoke it in the fifth century under the Visigoths. As with their language, the people remained faithful to their old beliefs, they continued to venerate their sanctuaries and their local divinities, and to preserve their ancient customs. And their habits retained the roughness, rudeness, if you will, of the good old days of independence.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But the Gauls abandoned at least their warlike practices. Thirty years after the conquest Strabo observes that all their energies were concentrated on works of peace. A few rebellions, it is true, broke out, like the revolt of the Bellovaci in 48 B.C. But they were insignificant. And from that time onwards a single cohort of 1200 men was sufficient to guard a huge territory. About the middle of the first century A.D. the Emperor Claudius was able to say to his senators :

"Never, since she was conquered by the divine Julius, has Gaul wavered in her allegiance; never, even in the most critical circumstances, has her attachment been broken."

"I can never understand," says Camille Jullian, "how Gaul consented to remain a Roman province."

But let us consider the state of Gaul. We have seen how important peoples, like the Remi and the Lingones, and towns like Poitiers, were from the first devoted to the cause of Rome. The Aedui, the most powerful people in Gaul, were on her side. Moreover, we must not regard this as the chief reason for the Romanisation of Gaul, for it is abundantly clear that the differences between Celto-Ligurian civilisation and Roman civilisation were not as great as might be supposed. Camille Jullian makes this quite clear. The great historian reminds us that a thousand years previously the Celts and Italians had spoken the same language, that this ancient bond not only with Italy, but with Greece, had left strong traces in the constitution of the family, in the structure of society and in religion. The Romans of the first century represented a civilisation more advanced in many particulars than the civilisation of Gaul, but they fitted into each other. There is, however, an even more important consideration. We have seen how in all the States, even among the Arverni, the patricians were on the side of Rome. Now the triumph of Rome made the patriciate all powerful. Not only did it once more resume the direction of affairs, but from the very fact that it was the patriciate, the cultivated class, it exercised a preponderating influence over the manners and customs and everything which constituted the life of the nation. Even before the conquest, the sympathies of the patrician Gauls were directed towards Rome; and they willingly became Roman. Cæsar heaped favours upon them and flattered their vanity.

ROMAN GAUL

Religion, in spite of the similarities we have just mentioned, might have proved an obstacle to the Romanisation of Gaul; but, as we have seen, the religion of the Druids was a religion of caste, of the patrician caste, in fact, and the patricians became Romans.

There remains the language. The love which all modern nations have for their own tongue did not exist in ancient times, at all events among peoples who had no literary past. Writing had only been known in Gaul for a short time, the Greek alphabet was used, and then only by a very small minority. To-day we cling to our own language as we cling to life itself, because it represents a magnificent mass of masterpieces created by the spirit of our nation, created by our own spirit, and is for us almost like the air we breathe. Nothing of the kind existed for the Gauls in the time of Cæsar, when Vercingetorix had the inscriptions round his image on coins inscribed in Latin.

Language was only a means of communication between men, and of all the various forms it had taken, the simplest, the most widespread and most useful appeared the best.

Augustus, the successor of Cæsar, divided Gaul into four provinces—the Narbonnaise, Aquitainia, and Celtic and Belgic Gaul.

The Narbonnaise included the old Roman province, Transalpine Gaul, to which some neighbouring districts, such as those of the Allobroges, the Volcæ and the Helvii, had been added. It was roughly bounded by the Mediterranean, the Pyrenees, Haute Garonne and the Cevennes, by that part of the Rhone

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Augustus carried on the policy inaugurated by his predecessor, Cæsar. He appointed as Governor of all the Gauls a prince from his own family, his son-in-law Claudius Drusus, one of the finest figures of his age.

Drusus was young and willing, endowed with a clarity of vision and activity which were reminiscent of Cæsar, but with the additional gift of nobility. He succeeded in inspiring veritable enthusiasm in the breasts of the Gauls. He understood the danger of German pressure on the Rhine, and after the massacre of some Italian merchants by the Usipites and the Tencteres, he made his first expedition against them (12 B.C.). The following year he undertook a further campaign, during which he penetrated as far as the Lippe district and reached the Weser. In the year 9 B.C. a third expedition brought him to the banks of the Elbe. He had crossed the Hercynian forest of ancient legend. The young hero died on his way back, in the heart of Germany.

The policy of Drusus was continued by Germanicus and Tiberius, but it had received a definite set-back. The young prince had at least marked his sojourn in Germany by a splendid undertaking carried to a successful issue—that canal of Drusus (fossa Drusiana) which diverts some of the waters of the Rhine and the marshes in its delta into the Yssel, and through the Yssel into the sea.

In the year 12 B.C. on the eve of his departure for the war in Germany, Drusus had built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Saône, at the “confluence,” as it was more briefly called, an altar to the two great divinities of the day, Rome and Augustus, the high altar of that cult which was to take the place of the religion of the Druids—the worship of the deified Emperors.

It is difficult in our days to understand how anyone could adore a living person, even if he were Emperor, and render him the religious homage due to a god.

The very name of “Augustus” was a proof of the worship given. It was not the name of a man. It formed part of the Roman ritual and signified “sacred, divine.” The Roman Senate bestowed it on Octavian, the heir of Cæsar, and from Octavian it was handed down to his successors.

The altar at the confluence dedicated to Rome and Augustus was unveiled by Drusus in the presence of the delegates from sixty of the old Gallie peoples and was surrounded by devies representing these sixty peoples. This took place on the 1st August, 12 B.C. A regular cult was established, the high priest of which, the Primate of the Gallic Church, was called "the priest of Rome and of Augustus." From that day forward, on the same date every year, in the presence of pilgrims from every quarter of Gaul, the ceremonies of the cult were solemnly repeated.

ROMAN GAUL

The cult spread to all the "cities," in the capitals of which its altar was erected, with a high priest elected by the "city" and a band of clergy ordained for its ceremonies. The inscription at Narbonne ran as follows :

"The people of Narbonne have dedicated this altar to the divine Augustus and have vowed him an annual feast for ever. May this be to the honour and glory of the Emperor Cæsar, son of the divine Julius, Augustus, father of our country, sovereign pontiff, and to the honour and glory of his wife and his children, and of the Senate, the Roman people and the town of Narbonne, which dedicates itself and devotes itself for ever to the worship of his divinity."

Thus was the worship of Augustus celebrated, and was followed by the worship of Drusus, Vespasian, Marcus Aurelius and the other Emperors. The dignitaries connected with it were persons of exalted rank, members of the noblest families; their chief took precedence of the highest magistrates, and the cult was enriched by annual festivals. It was to be found, in a humbler guise, in the villages and dwellings of the poor.

This homage rendered to living men must not be regarded as sycophany. To the ancients it seemed quite natural. Similar worship existed among the Egyptians and the Greeks. To the Iberians Sertorius and to the Lusitanians Viriathus were demi-gods.

The very nature of religion in those days led to such deification. The family manes were worshipped, that is to say libations were poured to dead relatives, and offerings placed on the altars consecrated to them. Every family had their lares, the founders of their "house." And if men became deified after their death, why not during their lifetime? It was

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Augustus carried on the policy inaugurated by his predecessor, Cæsar. He appointed as Governor of all the Gauls a prince from his own family, his son-in-law Claudio Drusus, one of the finest figures of his age.

Drusus was young and willing, endowed with a clarity of vision and activity which were reminiscent of Cæsar, but with the additional gift of nobility. He succeeded in inspiring veritable enthusiasm in the breasts of the Gauls. He understood the danger of German pressure on the Rhine, and after the massacre of some Italian merchants by the Usipites and the Teneteres, he made his first expedition against them (12 B.C.). The following year he undertook a further campaign, during which he penetrated as far as the Lippe district and reached the Weser. In the year 9 B.C. a third expedition brought him to the banks of the Elbe. He had crossed the Hercynian forest of ancient legend. The young hero died on his way back, in the heart of Germany.

The policy of Drusus was continued by Germanicus and Tiberius, but it had received a definite set-back. The young prince had at least marked his sojourn in Germany by a splendid undertaking carried to a successful issue—that canal of Drusus (fossa Drusiana) which diverts some of the waters of the Rhine and the marshes in its delta into the Yssel, and through the Yssel into the sea.

In the year 12 B.C. on the eve of his departure for the war in Germany, Drusus had built at the confluence of the Rhone and the Saône, at the “confluence,” as it was more briefly called, an altar to the two great divinities of the day, Rome and Augustus, the high altar of that cult which was to take the place of the religion of the Druids—the worship of the deified Emperors.

It is difficult in our days to understand how anyone could adore a living person, even if he were Emperor, and render him the religious homage due to a god.

The very name of “Augustus” was a proof of the worship given. It was not the name of a man. It formed part of the Roman ritual and signified “sacred, divine.” The Roman Senate bestowed it on Octavian, the heir of Cæsar, and from Octavian it was handed down to his successors.

The altar at the confluence dedicated to Rome and Augustus was unveiled by Drusus in the presence of the delegates from sixty of the old Gallie peoples and was surrounded by deviees representing these sixty peoples. This took place on the 1st August, 12 b.c. A regular cult was established, the high priest of which, the Primate of the Gallie Chureli, was ealled "the priest of Rome and of Augustus." From that day forward, on the same date every year, in the presence of pilgrims from every quarter of Gaul, the ceremonies of the cult were solemnly repeated.

ROMAN GAUL

The cult spread to all the "cities," in the capitals of which its altar was erected, with a high priest eleeted by the "city" and a band of clergy ordained for its ceremonies. The inscription at Narbonne ran as follows :

"The people of Narbonne have dedicated this altar to the divine Augustus and have vowed him an annual feast for ever. May this be to the honour and glory of the Emperor Cæsar, son of the divine Julius, Augustus, father of our country, sovereign pontiff, and to the honour and glory of his wife and his children, and of the Senate, the Roman people and the town of Narbonne, which dedicates itself and devotes itself for ever to the worship of his divinity."

Thus was the worship of Augustus celebrated, and was followed by the worship of Drusus, Vespasian, Mareus Aurelius and the other Emperors. The dignitaries connected with it were persons of exalted rank, members of the noblest families; their chief took precedenee of the highest magistrates, and the cult was enriehed by annual festivals. It was to be found, in a humbler guise, in the villages and dwellings of the poor.

This homage rendered to living men must not be regarded as syeophaney. To the aneients it seemed quite natural. Similar worship existed among the Egyptians and the Greeks. To the Iberians Sertorius and to the Lusitanians Viriathus were demi-gods.

The very nature of religion in those days led to such deification. The family manes were worshipped, that is to say libations were poured to dead relatives, and offerings plaeed on the altars conseerated to them. Every family had their lares, the founders of their "house." And if men beeame deified after their death, why not during their lifetime? It was but a short step from one to the other, and if there were reason to take it, surely it would be in the case of the master of the world.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Moreover, the meaning which we apply to-day to the word "god," as representing the creator and sole ruler of the universe, was not that used by the ancients. They honoured thousands of gods, each of whom enjoyed limited power and possessed the virtues and vices of human nature. Ajax, under the walls of Troy, wounded the god Mars and made him howl in agony. A spring, a tree, a hill, each had its god; why should not Rome, the mistress of the world, have hers? "The queen of towns," said Ausonius, the poet of Bordeaux, "is Rome, the golden town, the abode of the gods." Let us also remember what to the French of the old régime was the person of the king, reigning by the grace of God, anointed with oil sent straight from Heaven by a dove which was the Holy Spirit, the King clad in the Church's raiment, working miraculous cures to the beat of the drum. Strangers used to say "The French worship their King." Was this very far removed from the deification of Augustus as the ancients understood it?

And do not we too place men on pedestals—the saints, to whom we render an obeisance differing but little from that paid by the ancients to their lares and their demi-gods, as well as to their gods. Saint Michael is an angel, but Saint Joan of Arc was a woman. They stand side by side in our churches.

Thus, if we reflect a moment, and remember above all what deification meant in the beliefs of the ancient world, we shall be the less surprised by the worship of Rome and of Augustus.

We have already mentioned the decay of the religion of the Druids at the time of the Roman conquest. Rome did not even think it necessary to fight Druidism, but merely contented herself with forbidding human sacrifice. So far were the Druids from being proscribed that their name is still to be found in the fourth century. And in their fall they even seem to have survived the priests of the Roman religion, and to have disappeared only with the rise of Christianity.

Truth to tell, the upper classes, the educated people whom until the arrival of the Romans, the Druids had almost entirely ruled, recognised them no more, and humbling themselves, they became the counsellors and priests of the common people. Fustel de Coulanges calls what survived of their teaching mere superstition. But it should perhaps be described with greater respect. This persistence of the Druids until the Frankish conquest proves the survival, with their customs, their beliefs and their familiar energy, of the old Celto-Ligurian race; it seemed to have lost its vitality, or rather pre-Christian writers no longer mentioned it. But it still lived on with all its forces intact. Pass on, Romans and Franks, you who despise it as that whereof slaves and serfs of the soil are made; pass on and salute; it will outlive you all!

ROMAN GAUL

We find similar testimony provided by their language. The Celtic tongue disappeared from Gaul very much more slowly than is generally supposed. The upper classes, it is true, quickly adopted the language of the conquerors, it was the language of the officials, the legislature, the tribunals, of edicts and imperial proclamations; the civil administration would allow no other. But this did not apply to the lower classes.

A proof of the importance of the Celtic language and of its persistence for many a long year is to be found in the manner in which it penetrated even into Latin itself, at all events in Gaul, and that even in the case of the most common words; from the Celtic Latin borrowed bladum (blé, corn), alauda (alouette, lark), braccæ (braies, breeches), leuga (lieue, league), arepennis (arpent, acre), cervisia (cervoise, ale), etc.

Now the French language, which, taken as a whole, is nothing but a slightly modified form of Latin, is derived, not from the language of Cicero and Virgil, the language of the imperial proclamations and edicts, of the Roman administrative bodies and deliberative assemblies, it does not even owe its origin to the influence of the native aristocrats who spoke the literary language of Roman society—the French language was derived from popular Latin, which was very different from classical Latin both in structure and vocabulary. And this popular Latin was propagated in Gaul by Christianity which, from the second century onwards, gradually established it wherever Christianity itself had triumphed.

It was by means of popular Latin that Christianity spread in Gaul and it was by the missionaries of this religion that it often command the legions, you administer the provinces; between us and you there is no longer any division or barrier."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

About the middle of the first century a few insurrectionary movements were fomented by certain nobles. But they came to nothing. The unfortunate insurgents possessed neither military organisation nor weapons. In 68 the rebellion of Vindex broke out. This was something of a very different nature. Nero was on the throne of Rome, and at the moment was at Naples. Caius Julius Vindex, a Roman senator and Governor of Celtic Gaul, was a Gaul by birth, a member of an illustrious race and of royal descent. He did not aim at severing Gaul from the bonds of Rome, but declared that he was outraged by the crimes of the Emperor. He wished to depose Nero in favour of Galba, the Governor of the district of Tarragon (a Roman province of Spain). Galba was well known in Gaul, and held in high esteem; he had once been Governor of Aquitania and Upper Germany. The Celts responded to the appeal of Vindex. Verginius Rufus, who was in command on the Rhine, arrived in haste with his legionaries, and Vindex was defeated in the neighbourhood of Besançon and committed suicide (April-May, 68). But the rebellion was none the less important, even more so for the history of the Roman Empire than for that of Gaul; for the Gauls had proved the power of the provinces to elect an Emperor. Moreover, in spite of the victory of the Rhine legions before Besançon, the cause of Galba triumphed; the army in Spain proclaimed him "Augustus." Nero committed suicide and Galba marched across the Narbonnaise to Rome to assume the purple. During his reign, short though it was, for he was murdered by the Praetorian Guards on the 28th of January, 69, he was able to show his gratitude to Celtic Gaul by lowering the tribute it paid to the Empire and increasing its right to Roman citizenship.

Galba was succeeded by Vespasian, Titus Flavius Vespasianus, who inaugurated the era of the Flavian Emperors—Vespasian, Titus and Domitian (69-96 A.D.). It was a period of peace, work and order. The Roman legions drove back the Germans and the Rhine cities were organised. The Gauls were able to turn their industrial gifts and love of agriculture to account: it was an epoch of material prosperity. They were only troubled for a short period under Vespasian by the revolt of Civilis, a German from Batavia, whose appeal for independence nevertheless found an echo in Gaul. Veleda, the German prophetess, inflamed the hearts of the insurgents, who seized Cologne, which had quite recently been founded by the Romans. The Druids in Gaul were aroused and harangued the people. The enthusiasm was sufficiently great for delegates from the various cities to hold an assembly at Rheims. Taeitus has described their deliberations; the conclusion reached was that it would be better not to continue the movement; and, in the circumstances, this was perhaps best. For a whole century too many vital, vigorous and well-organised elements had been weakened and stifled, or else had atrophied in inactivity. Gaul felt the German menace weighing her down. She could not longer hope to struggle against it single-handed with the diminished forces at her command. Safety and self-interest both prompted her to remain faithful to Rome. Moreover, the delegates who met at Rheims were drawn exclusively from the patrician class.

ROMAN GAUL

It was on this occasion that Cerialis, the Governor of Lower Germany, made the speech to the Treviri reported by Taeitus.

His words to the Gauls were :

"The Germans are poor, you are rich. If we Romans demand military service from you, if we impose tribute, it is in order to secure you peace. . . . We have had bad Emperors and we have suffered at their hands more than you; we have had good ones and it is you who have reaped the benefit. . . . You must learn to submit to inevitable evils as you submit to the scourges of nature. Shoulder your burdens for the sake of the reward they bring you. Our city is not closed against you. We place at the service of all the benefits she confers. How often have you not been in command of our legions, governors of our provinces? Therefore love Rome and respect her! For what would happen, ye gods! if she were to fall?"

After Domitian the Imperial throne was occupied by Nerva (96-98), who was succeeded by Trajan and after him by Hadrian (117-138). It was a flourishing period for the Empire. If Gaul did not fulfil the vigorous, fertile and original destiny promised her by such leaders as Ambigatus, Bituitus and Celillus, and for which Vercingetorix had laid down his life, at least she enjoyed peace and tranquillity "The whole of Gaul," says the historian Josephus, "Gaul, which was neither effeminate nor degenerate, rendered willing obedience to twelve hundred Roman soldiers." Even on the Rhine the Germans ceased, for a time, to be menacing—the great Pax Romana mentioned by Pliny the Elder had been inaugurated, immensa Romanæ pacis majestas ("Natural History," XXVII 1, 3)

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The towns increased in beauty and prosperity. The geographer Pausanias describes Gaul as one of the richest, best populated and most civilised provinces of the Empire. The Emperor Hadrian himself was astonished at the zeal displayed by the Gauls in trying to transform themselves into Romans "When the Gauls might behave in their cities in accordance with their own laws and customs, is it not astonishing to see them transforming them into Roman colonies?" were his words.

In 138 there ascended to the throne of the Empire the monarch who gave his name to the dynasty and to this golden age of Roman history—Antoninus Pius. Nimes was the birthplace of his paternal grandfather, and the Gauls were able to salute a fellow-countryman in him. In 161 he was succeeded by his adopted son, Marcus Aurelius (161-180). A noble spirit, worthy of his predecessor, he brought all the virtues with him to the throne; and yet his reign was a period of decadence. The frontiers were menaced, the undertaking of public works slackened, the roads were neglected and the industry of Gaul decayed. Her famous red-figured pottery in which she excelled died out, and Christianity, which had taken vigorous root in Gaul, suffered the most terrible persecution. Under Marcus Aurelius, the most virtuous and wisest of the Emperors, the year 177 was marked by the horrible torture of the martyrs of Lyons.

In 178, a German tribe, the Chauci, broke through the barrier of the Rhine. By way of Cologne and Bavay they reached Tongres, pillaging, burning and massacring as they went. Didius Julianus at last succeeded in driving them back. From 180 to 193, that human monster, the Emperor Commodus, presided over the first catastrophes suffered by the Empire. After him, Septimius Severus, a provincial, an African, born in the district of Tripoli, nevertheless made an effort to renew its stability and cohesion. Rough, decided and energetic, he aimed at restoring order in the vast establishment, but it was too great a task for the activities of one man. His Punic origin and his Carthaginian accent were mocked at. To deprive the senatorial oligarchy of the authority it still enjoyed, to complete the assimilation of all the imperial provinces to Italy, by depriving Rome and the Senate of their supremacy, were his main objects. It meant the destruction of the old Cæsarian conception, organised by Augustus, and the latter found a defender in the person of Clodius Albinus, who was in command of the legions in Great Britain. Albinus came and installed himself at Lyons. Severus, with the troops which had been encamped in the region of the Danube, hastened to the spot. Gaul became the theatre of the struggle.

ROMAN GAUL

A furious battle, in which 150,000 men were engaged, was fought at the gates of Lyons; in a hand-to-hand fight the combatants entered pèle-mêle into the town, which was set alight in the confusion. The beautiful city at the confluence had to be rebuilt. Severus won the victory and Albinus committed suicide. The policy of decentralisation had definitely triumphed.

Aurelius Antoninus, surnamed Caracalla, the son and successor of Severus (211–217) accentuated the policy of his father by the famous edict, the exact date of which is not known, bestowing upon all the free-born subjects of the vast Empire the title and rights of Roman citizens.

There is no need, however, to pay homage to his greatness of soul; he was merely concerned with increasing the revenues of the imperial exchequer, by making a large number of people pay the tax of five per cent. on all estates.

Caracalla, a rough and brutal soldier, who succeeded in making the barbarians respect the Rhine frontier, inherited his father's tastes and had but little sympathy for Latin civilisation. He was born at Lyons, and wore the costume of the Gauls, whence his name "Caracalla," which meant the Gallic tunic with a hood, a dress which the Emperor not only wore himself, but imposed upon his followers.

The reign of Alexander Severus (225–235) is like an oasis in the history of the period. He succeeded Heliogabalus. The Praetorians proclaimed him Emperor in his fourteenth year, and spectacles in which unfortunate human beings were devoured by wild beasts, and that for the declamations, not always very entertaining, of the orators of Bordeaux and Autua, were substituted the "light" lays of the merry jugglers.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As a mark of his position, the Governor of a province wore the purple cloak, the imperial mantle. He had a bodyguard of lictors. He enjoyed extensive authority, including the power of life and death. To fill these offices personages of high rank were chosen, senators, and by preference the richest among them, in order that their wealth might save them from the temptation of peculation and enable them to maintain in the provinces a train worthy of the Emperor they represented.

The town in which the Governor resided was regarded as the capital of the province. And it soon assumed the aspect of it on account of the traffic, the luxury, the officials and the clients which it attracted.

The financial administration was in the hands of the commissaries or procurators of the prince (procuratores). A head procurator commanded them, "the procurator of the province," who was himself under the authority of the Governor. It sometimes happened that in the case of provinces of minor importance, like the three Alpine provinces, the offices of Governor and procurator were vested in the same person.

The office of procurator was exceedingly lucrative. He had in his hands the management of the public moneys, which in those days, as in many others, left a fairly large deposit behind in the coffers that had once held them. As the head of the financial administration, the procurator was cognisant of the disputes, litigation and delinquencies arising therefrom. Judge in all such matters, he tried to extend his jurisdiction in other directions, which brought him into conflict with the Governor.

Such were the most important wheels in the administration of a province, but in Roman Gaul the most essential element of it was the city.

The city was governed by a Senate, like Rome herself.

We have already seen that the Gallic cities were ruled by an assembly of the heads of clans, a feudal aristocracy; and in Roman Gaul this was left unchanged. The local aristocracy continued to direct affairs. In order to have a seat in the Senate the payment of a high rate of taxation was a prerequisite.

ROMAN GAUL

Members of these local Senates were called "decurions."

Thus the composition of the Senate in the Gallo-Roman cities remained the same as it had been in the days of independence, but its functions were quite different, being more extensive, detailed and complicated—a regular administration, in fact. And this is one of the most important and interesting points in connection with this transformation. It is not sufficient to change the name, or even the dress of the members of an assembly in order to endow them with a new character, fresh gifts and a different understanding of the requirements of social life and the means of meeting them. What did these gatherings of "senators" in the heart of a people mean in the time of Vercingetorix?—a reunion of feudal lords, each one of whom governed his own territory in accordance with the manners and customs peculiar to it, but met with the rest in order to discuss the common interests of the whole people. The Romans intervened and destroyed this feudal organisation, these customary rights and these local authorities, and thereupon invited these same feudal lords, or their sons and grandsons, henceforward called "decurions," to administer the same people henceforward called a "city." Society had been levelled. It was no longer the patron who ruled, but money. The feudal lords were transformed into financiers and administrators. But the poor were no longer dependent on anybody. In their inexperience they ran the cities into debt and soon it was necessary to appoint curators over them.

The office of decurion was unpaid as had been that of the Celtic senators, though the latter were compensated by the feudal organisation of which they were the heads and by the legitimate profits they derived from their position.

And here it would be well to repeat the very true observation made by that great historian Jacques Flach, that under the letter of the laws, which are not always in accordance with the life of the people to whom they are supposed to apply, we should try to discover the real life and customs of the community. There is legislative history, which is abstract and theoretic, last in the most grievous though occasionally most comic discord.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The duumvirs were elected by the assembly of decurions. They were, like the consuls, magistrates with judicial powers, though not extending to the High Court, which was in the hands of the representatives of the Emperor. Like the consuls, the duumvirs sat on curule chairs, clad in embroidered togas and a red-bordered tunic. They were accompanied by lictors with fasces, but without the axe denoting supreme power. In order to increase the prestige of the duumvirate, the Emperors sometimes accepted the office, exercising it by means of a representative.

Under the command of the duumvirs were placed the aediles and the questors. The latter were financial agents.

To the aediles was entrusted the upkeep of the roads, the public monuments, the baths and the markets. They had to arrange the distribution of corn and preside over the organisation of the games and public festivals. The aediles were more important personages than the questors, and were associated with the duumvirs in the administration of the city in such a way as to form with the latter a college of four magistrates.

The financial resources of the Gallic cities consisted in the revenues belonging to them, the common property of the old peoples which the Romans had left untouched. In addition there were donations, legacies left by rich citizens and the forced largesse of the decurions, the duumvirs and the aediles.

The proceeds from taxation went into the coffers of the procurators; they belonged to the State. These taxes were of various kinds—the capititation tax, a personal tax, similar to the poll-tax of later days; the chrysargyrum, which may be compared with the modern tax on turnover; the legacy duty; a tax on sales and markets; market tolls, the salt monopoly, payment in kind for the army, and the obligation to billet soldiers and officials on their journeys, and finally all the impositions by means of which the taxpayer was made to pay for the upkeep of the roads and bridges. These taxes were still in existence in the Middle Ages.

The weight of these various taxes does not seem to have been crushing. They were not even increased under those

ROMAN GAUL

Emperors who spent incalculable sums in ostentation and display. The heads of the Empire found it more expedient from time to time to cut the throats of a few rich persons and confiscate their goods.

Like a fascinating mirage of the past the picture of the Gallo-Roman towns charms our imagination. The fine ruins they have left, the Maison Carrée at Nîmes, the arenas at The Towns.

Arles, the temple at Vienne, the arch called after Tiberius at Orange, the Porte-noire at Treves, and the baths at Lutetia bring to our minds the shining image of a civilisation stamped with the beauty of Greece, but grander and more powerful. In addition there were the magnificent roads, so indestructible that to this day they still form an essential part of the French system of communication.

The Gallo-Roman towns had a forum. Those which were built on a navigable river or by the sea placed it on the quay, the others in the centre of the city, a vast and noisy square out of which the principal roads radiated. It was adorned with statues, including, as a rule, an image of the Emperor, such as that which stood in the forum of Paris. The forum was surrounded by buildings and porticoes. The basilica was built in its neighbourhood, as well as the public prison and horreum, as the municipal granary was called in which the reserves of corn were stored.

The basilica (from the Greek βασιλεύς, king) was the most important and for us the most interesting of all the buildings.

The Gallo-Roman basilica was a large building, rectangular in shape, supported by colonnades and entered by a portico. Inside was a huge well-lighted and airy hall, which occupied almost the entire edifice. At the sides there were occasionally small semi-circular apses, somewhat resembling the side-chapels in Romanesque churches. All round the hall on the first floor, or at all events on either side, ran a gallery, from which a full view could be obtained of the whole building.

The basilica was the place in which business was transacted, where public questions were discussed, and votes canvassed, as in the forum itself. At the end of the basilica was the court in which sat the duumvirs, the prætor or, in the capitals, the Governor himself. The merchants had their counters in the apses at the side, and, at appointed hours the nave was used as a stock exchange. It was in the basiliéa that the decurions met in their curia. A tabularium, a building in which the archives were kept, frequently adjoined it.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Gallo-Roman basilicas are of peculiar interest to us because they were afterwards used by the Christians for their meetings and the celebration of the divine sacrifice. It is easy to understand that the early Christians preferred them to the temples consecrated to idols. Thus at first churches were also used by the Christians as meeting places. Out of the basilicas the Romanesque churches were developed, and from the latter the Gothic churches. And this explains why no Gallo-Roman basilica has survived. The Christians transformed them as their religion developed, and in accordance with the demands of a new style of architecture.

The temples consecrated to the gods were copies of Greek architecture, but mere Roman imitations, the work of clever and attentive pupils, who had good examples to go by, but lacking the delicate mastery of their model, and the fire and life of original work.

From the second half of the second century there was a marked tendency to erect buildings of vast dimensions. The walls were enormously thick, some even measuring thirty feet in width. From the reign of Hadrian especially buildings reached grandiose proportions constructed according to plan, and were decorated in a style very far removed from classic simplicity. Thermae and amphitheatres assumed formidable dimensions. In the Middle Ages a vast concourse of people could assemble in the arenas at Nimes, which contained a belfried monastery and chapel—a small town within the town, living an independent existence, with peculiar privileges. The inhabitants of it were called "the knights of the Arenas."

In the thermae, or public baths, people went to bathe in large parties, spending many hours in them talking and hearing the news of the day. They consisted of a succession of sweating-rooms, basins and chambers of varying temperature—the tepidarium in which a gentle heat prevailed modified by a piscina of tepid water; the caldarium, which was so hot that if the limbs were moved at all rapidly they felt as though they were being burnt; and in addition rooms for games and gymnastics, porticoes, courts, terraces and gardens. The halls were decorated with paintings or mosaics; and in the porticoes there were statues. In these haunts of pleasure part of the town found the most agreeable amusements. Many a pleasant hour was spent there of which an echo is found even in epitaphs of the dead. And in watering-places these thermae, in all their varied luxury, enjoyed an even greater importance; for the Romans were familiar with the great French watering-places - Mont-Doré, Vichy, Luchon, Aix-en-Savoie, Néris, Lavaur, Royat, Chaudesaigues, Dax, Bagnères and the three Bourbon, Bourbon-l'Archambault, Bourbon-Lancy and Bourbon-les-Bains. Moreover, following the example of the Gauls, the Romans learnt to appreciate their curative properties, which they continued to attribute to the protective deity of the spring. The thermae, which possessed healing waters, also assumed a religious character. Baths and a temple would be found side by side, and the votive offerings discovered there bore witness to the ardour of the cult.

ROMAN GAUL

Entry to the thermae was open to the public and on certain days it was free.

Together with the thermae, the most important building in the town were the arenas, and theatres, large arenas arranged to hold large crowds of people; for the spectators were many. Everybody was granted admission, even to a charge.

The cities demanded large sums to them, and the wealthy citizens made them the object of their munificence. The theatre must not exceed the arena in size, and the latter occupied the site of the present Town Hall. It had a low foundation of stone from Gergovie. The building itself, the chief of a large amphitheatre open to the sky, with galleries tiered around. The upper galleries were covered with a row of seats and the lower ones with the orchestra. The entrance shut in at the back by a high wall, admitted to every one reverberating the sound of the voices, through which the actors Adjoining the amphitheatre was the stage where scenes from the spectacles, could well be seen from the top of the roof of the thermae and vice versa. The roofs of these buildings took refuge in each other. On this roof the thermae, like a of proscenium, boxes were built above the vaulted corridors leading to the orchestra. It was in these that important personages were seated, just as they are in our own day. The exterior of these buildings was very simple, almost bare. The only ornament consisted of pilasters or colonnades; but inside were countless statues and altars forming a most animated scheme of decoration.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Paris arenas, so happily reconstructed in the Rue Monge, were even vaster. They were nevertheless only of modest dimensions, like those of Lillebonne, Lisieux and Valognes, compared with the great arenas of the south. They were oval enclosures, and the arenas were protected, for a very good reason, by strong barriers. The tiers of seats were built up the side of Mount Sainte-Geneviève. The semicircle facing them had no seats, and was reserved for various shows, triumphal ceremonies, pantomimes and processions.

The site was happily chosen. From the tiers of seats the view must have stretched over the town, which as yet knew nothing of sky-scrappers, towards the verdant plain; it is true that the great awning, with which the arenas were probably covered, must have hidden the landscape.

In these imposing edifices all manner of spectacles, for the most part repugnant enough, used to be given—gladiatorial shows, in which the defeated combatant was put to death, unless the mob chose to give him his life. The victors received crowns and large sums of money, like our own boxers, who console themselves for not being rewarded with crowns by receiving even larger sums of money. As the gladiators, whose bodies were too well protected by armour, did not shed enough blood, criminals condemned to death were also kept for these exhibitions, and, under the eyes of the besotted crowd, delivered over to the beasts. In the brilliant second century, Christians were even dragged to the arenas. The panting mob watched the red blood flow, and the limbs of the victims writhe in an agony of terror, pain and death. What a charming amusement!

"They make a game of watching men torn to pieces," writes Salviens, "whilst the circus re-echoes the shouts of joy given by the assembled populace, applauding the ferocity of the bears and lions."

ROMAN GAUL

"In order to procure these beasts, no forest is left unsearched ; the Alps raise their peaks to the clouds, the valleys are buried in snow ; but nothing can stop our hunters. There is no country in the world too remote for the search for wild beasts, for the citizens must be provided with festivals at which they may taste at their ease the pleasure of seeing these animals make a quarry of men and devour their entrails."

And this was all that the imagination of several centuries of Latin civilisation was able to devise for the raising of the masses, for their amusement and recreation from their daily toil. The rich were given the phrases of the orators, the nonsense of the sophists, the laborious compositions of the versifiers. Truly Latin civilisation in Gaul was a fine thing ! And to think that it has been asserted, as is even still asserted, that French culture grew out of this !

The streets of the towns were narrow, the monuments crowded together. The principal artery was a continuation of the road, which joined district to district in the countryside—the high streets of the modern French towns, with which we have already met in the Celtic towns. Except for the forum, which was the centre of public life, there were no pleasure grounds or walks. Nothing was done to embellish the Gallo-Roman towns by means of open spaces, symmetrical buildings, vistas or parks. All such ideas—and this has not been sufficiently noticed—came into being only with the Bourbons—the Place Royale (Place des Vosges) in Paris marks an era ; it was built at the instigation of Henry IV, and was framed by palaces and houses of harmonious outline and colour, so that the whole presented a pleasing aspect. Then, too, for the first time, a space was set aside in the town for the health, pleasure and recreation of the citizens. Monuments, it is true, were not lacking in the Gallo-Roman towns, and of the most ornate description, decorated with statues, pilasters, cornices, friezes and pediments ; but they were never grouped into a decorative whole. Each edifice was built on its own account, for the utilitarian or moral purpose which had inspired it—the altars of the neighbourhood, fountains adorned with syrens, Tritons and other divinities with flowing beards ending in fishes' tails, statues of Emperors or of tutelary deities, altars consecrated to the local genii, some under penthouses, others under porticoes or the arches of a colonnade, some in niches, others fastened to the walls of the houses, protected against pollution by the figures of two serpents, which kept guard over them just as police notices do in modern towns.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The shops and the various trades all had their respective quarters, just as they had in the Middle Ages; here were the sandal-makers, yonder the tinsmiths and the metal-workers, further on again the butchers and potters. In Paris the potters were congregated together on the slope of Mount Sainte-Geneviève, which they had riddled with numberless holes. It looked like a giant rabbit warren. These were the pits from which they dug the clay necessary for their work, grey clay or red clay. Both kinds were to be found there. The Parisian potters had succeeded in entering into competition with their fellow workers in Auvergne, and used to send their "vessels," often decorated with figures, as far as Rome. Their table-ware in glazed and figured pottery had no rival; but here again originality was lacking—the models came from Italy.

The shops were numerous and occupied the ground floor of the houses looking on to the street. Wine merchants tried to secure shops at the corner of two streets, or in the squares or the forum; the Gallo-Romans were already acquainted with the "pub" at the corner. They not only retailed wine and ale, but also olives, oil, pickles and dried vegetables stored in large terracotta jars fitted on to the counters. Small covered stoves kept their alcoholic and spiced drinks hot.

The houses of the rich proved the luxury and wealth of the day, with their roofs of glazed tiles or gilt metal, their porticoes so designed that one side was in the sun whilst the other was in the shade, their marble or porphyry colonnades, their airy vestibules, cooled by a basin of water or a fountain, their central heating, the hot air being distributed by means of cleverly arranged stoves and pipes. The halls were decorated with pictures, mosaics and statues, and contained sardonyx tables, rare pieces of furniture beautifully carved, fashionable ornaments, bronzes, chin and glass.

These works of art were not original productions any more than were those which decorated the temples and public buildings in Gaul. The beautiful marbles which have been found in France came from Italy. With the example of America before us to prove how difficult if not impossible it is for a great people to produce an art of their own, when they are not natives of the soil but colonials, it will the more readily be understood how it was even more difficult for the Gauls of the second century to produce anything bearing the mark of their own genius.

ROMAN GAUL

Nevertheless in their sumptuous abodes the richest of the Gauls led a magnificent existence; some of them even had companies of comedians and ballet dancers in their service, for whom a stage was built at the end of the vestibule.

But all this luxury was at the expense of a slave population, which included the majority of the people, a fact which should not be forgotten by the apologists of that life of antiquity which in Gaul no longer even bore its old fruit—the terrible basis of that incomparable art and literature of Greece (that miracle of Greece extolled by Renan) and in Rome of a military and administrative grandeur such as has never been seen again.

In the middle class which was gradually being formed—as yet a comparatively small class—a pleasant family life did indeed exist, a centre of gentle radiance and of the culture of those mediocre but solid virtues which thrive on the common round of everyday life; but it would be vain to expect to find in it any idealism or enthusiasm, any exaltation of high enterprise or aspiration towards the beauty which elevates and which alone, in the blind alley of civilisation into which he has wandered, can enable man still to live a life worth living.

Private possessors of large fortunes spent them in the construction of arenas for gladiatorial shows and the slaughter of Christians, or temples dedicated to an uninspired worship of Caesar; or more usefully to the provision of public baths for the health and pleasure of the people and the building of splendid aqueducts by means of which drinking water was conveyed to the towns.

According to Camille Jullian, it was not until the best period of the Middle Ages in France, the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, that such a fever for building broke out as that which devoured the Gallo-Romans of the second and third centuries; but in the latter the spirit of charity was lacking. There were none of those wonderful works of the Middle Ages in which the soul of a generous nation palpitated, and the fervour of faith merged into devoted activity. But there were banquets worthy of Luernus and Bituitus, free baths for the refreshment of the citizens in their leisure hours—the distribution of corn, against which, however, Julian places a mark of interrogation—and above all the blood stained sand of the arenas, panem et circenses!

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As may well be supposed, luxurious dwellings were the exception and not the rule. Most places could not boast of any, and even in the most beautiful towns there were numberless hovels, legacies from the past, the old beehives with their thatched roofs and floors of beaten earth. The shops were of wood or pise, and there were also strange and outlandish erections inspired by visitors from the East. And it must not be supposed that these various dwellings were built in separate quarters for the upper and lower classes, like the eighth and twelfth arrondissements in Paris, the Grenelle and the Menilmontant quarters. Primitive huts stood side by side with the most sumptuous buildings.

The towns were, as a rule, well kept, and the cleanliness of the Gauls was proverbial.

Though free from the perpetual bustle and uproar which constitutes the charm of modern towns, the Gallo Roman towns were never quiet. There were the various cries of the street vendors with their baskets to which the rattle of the scrap iron carts and the hoots of the motors have alone put a stop in our own day—divers loud and strident cries, some of them already set to music. There was the din of the flaming forges, with the hammers falling in cadence on to the sounding anvil, and of the carpenters' benches, the town criers mingling with the lowing of the oxen and cows standing in rows on the market place or going along the streets, which they filled with greenish dung. And in the bird fanciers' shops the birds sang in their cages.

The women were free to come and go, and kept shops. The sale of perfumes was their speciality. The shrill nasal voices of these costermongers were everywhere to be heard. More generous than Louis XIV, the Roman Governors allowed them to carry on the trade of barbers, barbers for men, of course. There were no women lawyers as yet, though there were women doctosrs.

ROMAN GAUL

The Gallo-Romans of the towns gave up wearing their brilliantly coloured clothes, their cloaks with bright stripes of red and light blue, which imparted such life and gaiety, the gaiety of youth, to their national dress in the days of independence. The colours they now wore were all in one seale, ranging from white to brown, through the various shades of grey, yellow ochre and burnt sienna. They kept their breeches or trousers, their woollen tunies or coats and the hooded cloak, the earaealla, which was adopted by one of the Emperors and provided him with his surname, just as later on Hugh Capet was called after the cape. The colours of the earacalla, of a dark russet shade, was simply that of wool in its natural state.

The Governors and their lieutenants, carried about in their litters, wore their deep red togas in public; the decurions were clad in white togas with red borders. A few of the Gauls wore the tunie, and a struggle arose between Gallic and Latin fashions, in which the former won the day even in Italy.

The adoption of Gallic fashions by the Romans gave a great impetus to the cloth trade in France, which, together with pottery, became the trade par excellence of Gaul. "It is Gaul that clothes me," exclaimed Martial. The cloth of Artois and Hainault, of Champagne and Normandy, of Rheims and Elbeuf, was already famous; but Flanders, which was destined to become the leading cloth-making industry of the world, still lived outside the pale of civilisation, sombre and wild in the depths of her forests.

With the help of the details just given the aspect of Paris in the second century before our era can easily be reconstructed. The banks of the Seine were bordered by forests and marshes, the latter more especially the left bank. In the plain dominated by Montmartre the water stood stagnant, as the stream of Ménilmontant drained it too slowly. The Bois de Boulogne was a real forest. There was a villa at Passy, another at Neuilly. The Bièvre ran clear and bubbling through a forest of reeds.

The town of Paris was still chiefly concentrated in the island

THE EARLIEST TIMES

the medley of Homer and Virgil the materials were drawn supplying most of the iconography of the towns.

And this was not surprising. For we have only to remember Louis XIV, who was thoroughly French in taste and sentiment, and to look at the decorations of Versailles. Are there any signs there of the past of France of which the great king was the magnificent representative? Where is there a picture of Bertrand du Guesclin or of Joan of Arc or the Chevalier Bayard; where is there an echo of the old French epic legends, of Rolando, Guillaume d'Orange, the Round Table and the four sons of Aymon? . . . Nowhere. But Apollo smiles at Venus, Pluto carries off Persephone, Polyphemus hurls his great stones and wanton Naiads are chased by Tritons. When Le Brun wanted to paint Louis XIV he made the absurd suggestion that he should depict him in the guise of Hercules, but the king had enough good sense to put a veto on this ridiculous notion. But after this can we be surprised that the Gallo-Romans should have forgotten Luernus and Bituitus, and old Ambigatus and his nephews crossing Europe with their terrifying train in order, like fantastic precursors of the Crusaders, to found a kingdom in the East? To this oblivion of everything glorious in the past of Gaul the teaching in the schools and the diffusion of Latin letters contributed in no small measure.

The glory shed by Roman civilisation upon the towns of Gaul Belles Lettres, aroused feelings of admiration which led them to the culture of letters and the opening of schools held in high honour.

And indeed the Gallic aristocracy were successful in their zeal to assimilate the civilisation of the conquerors, and from the second century onwards produced famous writers who wrote in the Latin tongue.

The great schools of Marseilles and Autun were the first to set a shining example, those of Marseilles being renowned for their Greek learning. Autun became the university town par excellence, whilst second in importance was Toulouse, called by Martial "the town of Minerva." The three brothers of the Emperor Constantine were educated there. Rheims also had a brilliant reputation for the culture of letters. The rhetorician Fronto saluted it as the Athens of Gaul. The schools of Treves produced celebrated masters—Harmonius, who was admired as far as the East as a commentator on Homer. Saint Jerome went there to study.

ROMAN GAUL

The authors who were most studied were Homer and Virgil. On the verses of Homer children took their first steps in Greek. Among the educated classes Horace stood second in favour to Virgil, and was followed by Menander and Terence. But Lucan soon equalled them and surpassed them all, except Virgil, in popularity. The prose writers were not appreciated so much.

The cult of Aristotle had not yet been inaugurated. Plato was hailed as the god of philosophy, though neither his work, nor, indeed, that of any other philosopher, was very much studied. Historians took Sallust as their model, without copying him, and orators of necessity imitated Cicero. That was their main object—phraseology, the cult of the right word for its own sake. What they said had to be well said. And what was meant by “well said”? It meant to be said as others had said it before.

M. Bloch has written an admirable passage on this subject :

“ There was but little study of either science, philosophy or even law; but rhetoric remained. A text to be commented upon and a theme to be developed, this was all the end of education. Oratory, once the virile art of ancient society, had become an empty and frivolous toy. It had played such a grand rôle that it seemed impossible to oust it. But it was reduced to entirely conventional exercises, in which the main object was, under elegance of phraseology, to hide an entire absence of ideas. This discipline, which we have not yet altogether abandoned, had its uses. It made the mind supple and refined; but, practised for its own sake, as an end not as a means, and isolated from all serious study, it was barren and dangerous. It accustomed young men to put words before subjects and to hold the essence of less account than the form; it impoverished and stultified the mind, and if we study its effects in the most admired productions of the time, in the speeches of Himerius, the panegyrics of Eumenes, and most of the poetry of Ausonius, we realise the extent to which they were all devoid of substance and poetry and we shall not be far wrong in attributing lustre, ended in that vapid poet, with his head lost in mist and clouds, who has been surnamed the Virgil of Toulouse.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This lamentable decay of Gallo-Roman literature, in spite of all the efforts, the intellectual gymnastics, wasted time and constant encouragement from a Government and a society enamoured of fine language, wrests from Camille Jullian a cry of beautiful and poignant regret :—

“ How much better would it have been for the Gauls to have used the teaching of their own masters to convey the ideas and descriptions of their own country ; their history was fair enough for this, their nature rich enough. . . . But the idea never occurred to them to preserve or to imitate the poems of the Druids and the lays of their bards, and these works died a double death, a death that knew not decadence ”—killed by the Gauls themselves “ traitors to their past.” The phrase is Jullian’s.

On a tomb in the Gallo-Roman cemetery of Lectoure the following epitaph was found :

“ In the beginning I was naught and then I became somewhat, and, if I remember, it is to know that I am no longer and that for me there is naught.”

These lines full of bitter scepticism, if they are not applicable to life as it should be, at least furnish a fitting conclusion to this rapid sketch of Gallo-Roman literature.

Outside the life of the towns there was the life of the country, which was the most important, and by a very long way. For Country between the furrows on the brown earth, in the Estates and valleys, on the slopes of the hills, on the confines Villas. of the deep forests, on the banks of the clear rivers and along the coasts of the restless sea, the French nation came into being.

As we have already seen, the “ city ” included a wide stretch of country in which the large landed proprietors formed the Senate. The villages were comparatively few ; and instead of villages there were huge tracts of cultivated land developed from the great domains of the old days. Scholars have estimated that for sixty villages there were a thousand country estates. As in our own days, the majority of these villages were conglomerations of small peasant proprietors ; and the rest, situated along the high roads to serve the needs of travellers, consisted of groups of shops, cottages, posting-houses, inns and workmen's booths.

ROMAN GAUL

Nine out of ten of the villages of to-day were developed, not from the Gallo-Roman villages, but from the large estates.

These seignorial properties were divided into two parts—the villa urbana, reserved for the master, his family, his guests and personal servants, and the villa rustica, where all the working machinery of the estate was to be found, together with the slaves and their overseers and the cattle.

Thus, at some distance from the master's house there were the farmsteads with their various buildings, the latter surrounded by the huts in which the slaves lived. In the middle of these huts was the Ergastulum, a sort of underground dungeon destined for the confinement of such of these miserable creatures against whom the master or his underlings imagined they had grounds of complaint. A glance is sufficient to realise the difference between the serfdom of later days and Gallo-Roman slavery. The serf lived in a separate dwelling in the bosom of his family, on the patch of ground to which he belonged and which he cultivated; the slaves wandered about the estate in bands, or rather in flocks, under the command of the keeper of the convict gang, who incited them to work.

The principal building of the farm was constructed round a rectangular courtyard enclosed by galleries supported by wooden columns. On the ground floor was the kitchen, the dining hall, the wash-house, the horses' stables, the cowshed and the pigsty; on the first floor were the bedrooms above the stables, for the smell of manure was already considered exceedingly healthy; then there were the granaries and lumber-rooms.

In farms of any importance there was double stable accommodation, one set for the summer, the other for winter. They were flanked by small rooms filled with rustic odours, and inhabited by the shepherds and herdsmen. There were barns for the corn and hay, cellars for the oil, wine and winter fruits, besides the mill for grinding the corn into flour, the presses for the grapes and olives, the wheelwright's shed, and the dovecot, all of which buildings were grouped round a huge court (cortis), a name which was soon applied to the farm itself, and later, in the fifth century, to the whole estate As the farm continued to develop through a series of transformations, the old word, so modest in its origin, ended, after passing through all the links of the chain, by being applied to the royal Court and the Courts of Law

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The master's house was built on a pleasant site, and one from which the administration of the estate could easily be carried on. The banks of a lake or pond were often chosen, with a view over the smiling valley, and on the horizon wooded hills blue in the distance. The wooden buildings of the noble Gauls had been replaced by edifices of stone and brick, often with certain parts in marble. It was no longer the country house described by Cato the Elder and Varro. The atrium, with its impluvium, the basin built to catch the rain, was replaced by spacious galleries, numerous colonnades, some open to the air, others shut in by means of glazed partitions, and some of them supporting terraces of flowers. The portico, adorned with statues, led to the peristyle, which was paved with beautiful mosaics, many of which have been preserved to our own day. Out of the peristyle opened the reception rooms, the dining rooms, the divisorium or drawing room, arranged for all kinds of games, and sometimes a room for theatricals. The rooms reserved for intimacy were also grouped around, and everything was duplicated, so that there were winter quarters and summer quarters. And in both of them there were all the comforts which the Romans knew how to provide for their homes. The bath rooms were heated by underground furnaces (hypocausts) and there was a scent room.

The façade and the porticoes were adorned with sculpture, under the arcades there were statues, and on the walls medallions framing busts in high relief. Paintings decorated the inside walls, and among them portraits of the family were already to be found, and the badges of the high offices with which its members had been honoured.

The kitchens, which were lofty and large enough to serve as gathering places for the domestic staff, were placed outside the master's house, in a special building, an arrangement which was later also found in the seigniorial mansions of the Middle Ages, whence arose the custom of carrying covered dishes to table and the expression “mettre le couvert” which is still used in France.

ROMAN GAUL

Lastly, not far from his house, the owner had built for himself the marble or granite monument, which was destined to serve as a mausoleum under the shade of beautiful trees.

The Gallo-Roman villa, like the great estate of the days of independence, formed a complete economic and political unity. Though the master had lost the feudal rights of the olden times, he still ruled a large number of people. He bore the title of senator, and exercised the functions of the office in the town. The combination of the two titles, senator and great landowner, was so frequent that the words came to be regarded as synonymous.

It is not difficult to imagine the life of these great Gallo-Roman nobles, busy in town with their public functions, and in the country directing important operations on the land, assisted by their stewards, indulging in the pleasures of the chase, receiving their guests, and according to the taste of the age, cultivating literature, the whole standing out against a background of the besotted mass of slaves, sweating, panting and crying out beneath the lash of the whip.

Some idea of the grandeur and magnificence of these Gallo-Roman domains may be gathered from the fact that the ruins of some of them, like the one at Chiragan on the Garonne (Martres-Tolosane) covered over twenty thousand square yards and that excavations have brought to light over a hundred busts and statues, admirable bas-reliefs, such as the rape of Proserpina and the labours of Hercules; and that even these represent but a small proportion of the treasures of art the place contained.

In addition to his slaves, the “senator” maintained a host of free servitors, mercenaries, parasites and retainers, the remains of the old Gallie clients. Slavery, which gave the master absolute power over his subordinates, was an easier institution for the landed proprietor to manage, and his fortune enabled him to acquire possession of large numbers of slaves.

And this brings us to another important consideration—the disappearance, or at all events the weakening, of the freeborn persons surrounding the patron. The old Gallic system of chents and vassals was still a system of liberty, but under pressure of law it gave place to slavery. This was a change of the greatest importance, for it included the majority of the people. And we should like to ask the admirers of the "progress" achieved in Gaul under Roman domination whether this horrible retrogression into slavery, due to Roman law and administration, was not in itself sufficient to counterbalance the material advantages which the conquerors introduced into Gaul—better roads, stone buildings, thermæ, aqueducts, halls for shows and amusements of all kinds. The Romans may have increased the happiness of the upper classes, but to the nation as a whole they brought moral and physical degeneration, and an undermining of character and energy, the consequences of which made themselves felt all too soon.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The great landed proprietor on his estate directed the work, not only of the agricultural labourers, but also of the artisans. Hard by the groups of "cells" open to the air, the sun and the warm light of day, inhabited by the slaves who worked on the land, might be heard the buzz as from a busy hive coming from the "cells" of the artisans, also, alas! occupied by slaves. Thus the great work of cultivating the soil had its counterpart in the production of manufactured goods. All kinds of things were made which were not all destined for the use of the patron and his family. The master used to sell the produce of his mills, his smelting works, his mines, his workshops, his carpenters' benches, his brickworks, his potteries, his glass works, his iron works, his looms, and also his agricultural implements, just as he sold the produce from his farms and vineyards, his wine, his corn, his oil, his cattle, his smoked hams, his preserved game, his milk, his butter, his cheese and eggs.

Thus if we can conjure up in our imaginations one of these vast concerns, possessed and administered by a "senator," some of which covered an area of ten thousand acres, and supported an agricultural and artisan population of a thousand souls, we shall understand what, from the social, economic and political point of view, the "villas" which covered the whole of Gaul meant in the life of the nation.

Nevertheless, it must not be supposed that Gaul in the second century was composed entirely of large estates. There were never any of those colossal domains occupying an entire province which were to be found in Italy. Roman law, from the very fact that it put a check on the feudal system of clients, hindered the process of centralisation, which drove small proprietors, the weaker elements who could not protect themselves, to cling to the stronger. The development of the liberal professions, of the "commonalty" and of urban industries created small- and medium-sized estates belonging to those who could earn money. Until the end of the second century, and as long as the Roman Empire was flourishing, estates in Gaul, far from becoming amalgamated, continued to grow in numbers.

ROMAN GAUL

All that precedes has already enabled us to foresee the influence that Christianity was destined to exercise in Gaul and the importance it would secure. From the religion of Christianity. the Druids the masses had been excluded. It is true that they were allowed to indulge in the worship of the minor local divinities, the springs, the trees, the neighbouring hills haunted by their familiar spirits; and a whole host of reciters of mythical lore, inspired healers and malevolent or benevolent witches kept alive these traditional beliefs, to which was added a vague worship of the deified dead; for it was believed that their souls could not have perished—a simple-minded religion strongly rooted in primitive thought, which survived the conquest. Whilst the upper classes burnt incense to Rome and Augustus, whilst the Druids, under the ban of the Romans, gave way before the flamens, the Gallic people clung to their old and deep-rooted primitive mythology, reinforced by its old wives' remedies and by the miraculous cures at the gurgling springs, at the clear fountains and the great gnarled trees, which tradition had endowed with supernatural powers.

But what could be the development, in the course of time, of this decapitated religion, bereft of priests and all superior guidance, teaching or doctrine?

We have already seen the state to which the lower classes of the nation were reduced—a state of slavery, of toil on the land, and labour in industrially exploited workshops. In isolated districts, in unknown spots, in lake-dwellings among the marshes, in the depths of the woods and along the sea coast, a by no means desppicable fraction of the people still lived outside the pale of the spurious and superficial civilising process organised by the Romans. Strabo, fifty years after Cæsar, declares that Gaul was not entirely subjected to Rome, and points out that the woods and marshes were inhabited by a population which had no industries; whilst Hirtius says that after Cæsar's victories the towns were denuded of those who fled into the depths of the country in order to escape the rule of the conqueror. As late as the fourth century Ammianus speaks of regions of Gaul which had remained inaccessible to Roman culture. And it was here that the most interesting remnants of the people were to be found, those who still preserved their strongest social instincts. And lo, Christianity appeared! It is easy to imagine the echo it found in the hearts of the disinherited, and the support it received from them—Christianity which was born of the people, created by the people, which deified the son of a carpenter and was propagated by the apostles Peter and Andrew, James and John, who were the sons of fishermen, Christianity with its doctrine so full of humility and beauty, so stirring and generous, "Blessed are they that suffer for they are the elect of God."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

By the irony of circumstances, the first evangelists had to preach the gospel to the towns; and behold, the great religion of the people swept down upon Roman society, which was leading such a pleasant existence in its luxurious palaces, learning wisdom in the schools of the rhetoricians and finding its amusement in the games in the arenas: never was a more formidable boulder flung into a pool of minnows.

Nevertheless the rise of Christianity in Gaul is shrouded in obscurity precisely on account of its popular origin. The poor did not write, they did not know how to write. And even if they had known how to write books, they would have had neither the means nor the leisure. And if they had written them, nobody would have preserved them.

It is believed that it was in the reign of Nero, about the year 63, that the first evangelists made their voice heard in Marseilles. They came from the East and spoke Greek, and the people of Marseilles were able to understand them.

It took a century or more before the doctrine spread up the Rhone and gained a footing in Vienne, and afterwards in Lyons.

ROMAN GAUL

Moreover, at first it was everywhere received with suspicion. The first missionaries had to begin by addressing themselves to the educated classes, for they understood Greek and through them the evangelists hoped to secure a more rapid spread of their gospel. One may well imagine the astonishment with which these wealthy Romanised patricians, who frequented the temples and were disciples of the sophists, received a religion so different from anything they had ever seen or heard before. The religion of the Greeks fitted into that of the Romans like a woman's hand fits into a glove of the right size, as did also the religion of the Romans into that of the Gauls. Zeus, Jupiter, Taran—Hermes, Mercury, Teutates—Ares, Mars, Esus—it was all so easy. Cæsar spoke of Mercury, Apollo, Mars, Jupiter and Minerva, and observed, "The Gauls have very much the same conception of these deities as other nations": but the Olympus of the Christians was like nothing else in the world. What idea could be formed of a God who had no body, no passions, no human shape, a God who was one God, though he was three Persons, a God infinite and invisible although He was everywhere? It was unheard of! And then the morality which taught contempt for the good things of this world which the rich Gallo-Romans, no less than the sophists in their schools of wisdom and the rhetoricians in their schools of eloquence, were very far indeed from despising. It was the contradiction of everything they had ever believed.

Nevertheless the followers of Christ began to form themselves into humble societies which made converts round about. The first little church was founded at Marseilles, followed by the churches of Vienne and Lyons. They were organised in local and very secret conventicles, where the rites peculiar to the religion were observed and were imagined by those who did not participate in them to be something outrageous and monstrous.

The churches of Lyons and Vienne were in time joined by churches founded at Toulouse, Autun, Besançon and Treves. In the third century the churches at Rouen, Bordeaux, Paris, Bourges, Cologne and Sens came into being.

As Camille Jullian has so wisely observed, Christianity did not win the masses—the people who, as we have just seen, were so restive under the rule of Rome—or become a popular faith,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

until she produced her martyrs whose bodies were laid to rest in tombs placed preferably along the side of the road, unless they were reverently dismembered and divided among numberless reliquaries which were venerated in every district and became "sanctuaries for the healing of disease and the protection of harvests" Thus the hundreds of local divinities worshipped by the old Celts, at last supplanted, were able to die in peace, leaving their crowds of worshippers to the new Deity in all the glory of a radiant sky blushing with the blood of the martyrs

Christianity had no need to make any very great effort in Gaul against the worship of Rome and Augustus The marble statues were not very firmly fixed upon their gilded altars, and the halting dithyrambs in spondees and dactyls sung by sycophantic poets were but little calculated to steady them To make the mysterious fairies, the protecting deities and the laughing gnomes fall out of the great oaks and desert the crystal springs and the sunny slopes was, however, a very different matter

The very true explanation given by Camille Jullian must be supplemented by another based upon language The first evangelists, who came from the East, spoke Greek. With the advent of missionaries who spoke Latin, popular Latin, a sort of dialect, which was easily understood and to which in many places, at all events in the towns, the ears of the people were accustomed, their message raised a different response

The persecution of the Christians began under the wisest of the Emperors, Marcus Aurelius It is astounding that this true monarch, the author of that wonderful book, The Meditations, who in his outlook upon life was so nearly akin to Christianity, could possibly have unloosed such a terrible persecution. It is enough to confound the imagination, though on reflection it will appear less surprising For Christianity not only taught new religious ideas, but its doctrines were subversive of the whole social and economic organisation of the Roman Empire, of which the Emperor was the keystone of the arch. Later on the Church modified her teaching, she connived at slavery and even practised it; but the first neophytes insisted upon an absolute and radical application of the doctrine Thus to persons of established wealth and dignity they appeared like some sort of Socialists—and indeed they actually were Socialists, truer Socialists than those of our own day, who are not Socialists at all. They appeared in the light of anarchists with their furious anathemas against the rich, and their belief in the partition of goods and the equality of men.

ROMAN GAUL

The sublime story of the martyrs of Lyons has been handed down to us in an epistle which the Christian churches of Lyons and Vienne addressed to their “brethren in Asia and Phrygia,” and which has been preserved for us by Eusebius. It is a unique document on account of its date, A.D. 181, and its authenticity. It describes for us the Christian community of Lyons towards the end of the second century.

It was an extraordinary mixture—a lawyer, a rich merchant from Pergamos, a doctor from Phrygia, a lady who seems to have belonged to the best Roman society, but above all members of the populace, numbers of slaves, young men and young girls of fifteen or sixteen, and the little “flock” grouped about the crook of a nonagenarian Bishop, Saint Pothinus. It is easy to imagine the impression such a hotch-potch created in the minds of a hierarchy such as was the Roman society we have described. They were convinced that in the Christian conventicles terrible things were done, and that children were sacrificed. Under torture some of the slaves confessed what they were expected to confess. Christians were arrested at Lyons and Vienne. At the command of Marcus Aurelius, those of them who were Roman citizens were beheaded. The rest were reserved for the games in the circus. Their Bishop, St. Pothinus, died before paying the extreme penalty, under the torture they inflicted upon him. Their common martyrdom was synthesised in that of a young slave who answered to the charming name of Blandine, better fitted, it would seem, for one of Perrault’s fairy tales than for the martyrs’ calendar. Her mistress, who was also a Christian, was afraid that she might show weakness under torture, deny her faith and bring accusations against her co-religionists. But Blandine did not falter. In the agony of torture, she constantly repeated to her executioners in a clear, calm voice: “I am a Christian, and nothing wrong is done amongst us.”

She had sustained her younger companions when they were the motive force was supplied by Gaul, by the mass of the people, who had at last emerged into the light of day. At last, thou ancient stock of Celts and Ligurians, the hour had come, awaited with infinite patience, to show the world the wonderful seed thou hadst hidden in thy bosom !

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Church of Paris had her martyrs about the middle of the third century under the reign of the Emperor Decius (249-251) in the persons of St. Denis and his companions Rusticus and Eleuthereus. Truth to tell, their history is shadowed in obscurity. All that is known about them is to be found in a few lines by Gregory of Tours, who lived three hundred years after their martyrdom.

Gregory relates how, in the reign of Decius, seven men were consecrated bishops and sent to preach the Gospel throughout Gaul—"to the people of Tours, Bishop Gatianus; to the people of Arles, Bishop Trophimus; to Narbonne, Bishop Paul; to Toulouse, Bishop Saturninus; to the Arverni, Bishop Austremoine; to the people of Limoges, Bishop Martial; to the Parisii, Bishop Denis."

"The blessed Denis, Bishop of Paris, having suffered divers tortures for the name of Christ, ended his earthly life beneath the sword."

That is all we know and it comes from an authority who lived three hundred years later. Tradition has it that St. Denis and his two companions were beheaded on the hill in Paris which was called the Mons Martyrum, the Martyrs' Mount, Montmartre. But it seems more probable that the Bishop of Paris was beheaded at Saint-Denis. It was at Saint-Denis that his tomb was built, at the side of the Roman road where St. Geneviève was to raise her basilica. The Mons Martyrum was founded on a fable invented in the ninth century by Hilduin, the Abbot of St. Denis. According to Fredegar, who lived in the seventh century, Montmartre was at that time called Mons Mercurii, that is to say, Mons Mercurii, the Mount of Mercury, from which the word Montmartre was derived. But is not the text of Fredegar corrupt? The tonic accent of Mercurii is on the second syllable, and the word which gave birth to Montmartre must have had it on the first. In the time of the Romans there stood on this legendary hillock, not only a temple of Mcreury, but also a temple to the god Mars. Now the word Mars would produce Mons Martis, of which the correct development would be Montmartre, as the inhabitants of the hill and the whole of Paris still call it, thus once more giving spectacled pedants a lesson in etymology and in the proper pronunciation of the French language.

ROMAN GAUL

When by their energy, their lively faith and the blood they had shed, but above all because their doctrine responded to the requirements of a new type of society, the Christians had increased in numbers throughout Gaul, they used to meet together for the celebration of their religion in the Roman basilicas, which were better suited to their taste than the temples sullied by the worship of false gods. Moreover, it was not long before they built churches specially designed for their meetings and ceremonies, moulding them on the plan of the basilicas to which their form of worship had become adapted and calling them by the same name.

The entrance to the basilica, or Christian church, was through a front portico leading to the atrium, that is to say a court open to the sky and surrounded by galleries like cloisters; this led to a vestibule, the narthex, through which entry was made into the church proper—a vast rectangular hall covered by a roof with naked rafters. A double row of columns with antique capitals divided the hall into three naves, in which the crowd was not allowed to circulate as it pleased, the right being reserved for men, the left for women, and the centre for the clergy. At the end of the central nave was the altar, a very simple, plain erection, without statues, illuminated by a few lights, in remembrance of the first masses celebrated in the darkness of the catacombs. It consisted mainly of a large rectangular stone, slightly raised above the ground, behind which the priest said Mass facing the congregation. There were two lecterns for the reading of the gospel for the day and the epistle. At the end of the apse was the "cathedral" desk reserved for the celebrant. The outside roof had a double slope, like ordinary roofs in our own days. With the growth of Christianity in Gaul, many of these basilicas attained to fine proportions and were lavishly decorated—the ceiling was gilded, and the columns were made of different coloured marbles.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

at invasion; but they were renewed and threatened not only the line of the Rhine, but also that of the Danube. The Goths appeared in the Balkans; very soon they penetrated into Macedonia (A.D. 251).

These migrations, as we have already pointed out, were a necessity for the Germans. Beaten by the Romans, who sent punitive expeditions into their territory, they saw their lands ravaged, and were obliged to pay tribute and conclude humiliating treaties. But, shortly afterwards, a fresh invasion was let loose—the Franks were thrust out by the Saxons, the Alemanni by the Burgondes. It became necessary to advance.

The Roman army was the only rampart of Gaul and indeed of the whole Empire; for a similar abandonment of the warlike virtues which Rome had forced upon Gaul had also taken place among the Romans themselves. Their armies were composed of mereenaries, and even of the very barbarians whlich it was their mission to repulse; henee the growing importance of the legions in the constitution of the Empire. What meaning could the senate and people of Rome, S.P.Q.R., any longer possess?

The armies alone now had the power of making an eloquent appeal, for they alone had the power of making themselves heard. They created and destroyed Emperors, raising the good and the bad at random to power and then massnering them, killing the best of them, like Alexander Severus (A.D. 235).

And, at the beginning of the third century, with the accession of the Sassanides to the throne of Persia and the awakening of a fanatical lust of conquest, the Empire was confronted by the Eastern peril as well as by the German peril.

At this period there appeared for the first time two German nations who were destined to play a great part in history—the Franks and the Alemanni. These peoples, like all the invading hordes, came from the north, from the coasts of the Baltic, and the basins of the Elbe, the Oder and the Vistula. Their names, Franks and Alemanni, do not seem to have been ethnic in origin, any more than the names of the Belgæ and the Germans themselves. They were war names applied to themselves by peoples of divers origin united under one chief or one family for the purpose of war. Frank no doubt meant "Brave"; Alemanni, "people of all kinds" (alle, all; man, man).

ROMAN GAUL

The Alemanni appeared in 213 in the reign of Caracalla, who inflicted a defeat upon them from which he derived his second surname "Germanicus"; the Franks first began to be mentioned in 241, under Gordianus, also in connection with a defeat inflicted upon them by the Roman army commanded by Lucius Domitius Aurelian, the future Emperor Aurelian, at that time a military tribune.

The Franks occupied, on the right bank of the Rhine, the region lying between the North Sea and the Main; the Alemanni extended further south, from the Main to the Alps.

To these two nations was added a third, whose name was destined to resound through the ages—the Burgondes or Burgundians. In the first century they were to be found on the shores of the Baltic, as neighbours of the Goths. The Gepidæ, a Gothic people, attacked them and seized their lands. The Burgondes pushed southwards, and reaching the district of the Black Forest, they halted in the neighbourhood of the Alemanni. It was not long before the Burgondes formed connections with the Roman garrisons which acted as advanced guards on the right bank of the Rhine, and the families of the two nations became closely joined by marriage. Thus the manners and customs of the Burgondes were modified; they built properly arranged villages instead of the scattered dwellings characteristic of the Germans, and in the third century we find them established on the right bank of the Rhine with a culture similar to that of the Gauls.

About 257 bands of Alemanni forced the barrier of the Rhine, crossed the Alps and appeared before the walls of Ravenna; but they were utterly routed on the plain of Milan by the Emperor Gallienus; meanwhile other bands traversed Gaul diagonally and crossing the Pyrenees, seized Tarragona, and by way of Spain went and lost themselves in Africa.

It is easy to imagine the ruin they left everywhere in their train and the sorry spectacle afforded by Gaul and Spain who, when once their frontiers were violated, found themselves abandoned by their masters, the Romans, who had conquered and disarmed them, and defenceless before a danger which had already threatened them for hundreds of years.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In 268 the Alemanni were again defeated in Italy by the Emperor Claudius II.

In connection with these various victories of the Roman troops over the Germans, Fustel de Coulanges emphasises the facility with which the Empire got the better of its enemies. "We are apt," he writes, "to exaggerate the strength of these barbarians. But they were conquered by Roman armies exceedingly small in numbers, often amounting to fewer than 30,000 men. These barbarians, who were badly led, only took towns that were undefended, and advanced into a country only as long as they did not meet the Roman army; they avoided battles, fought without either order or tactics and at the first check begged for peace."

The Romans continued to attribute these easy victories to the fine organisation and discipline which the leaders had established among the troops, and the contrast between the Germans and the legionaries was well illustrated on the occasion of a visit paid by two kings of the Alemanni to the Roman camp :

"They found themselves among equals—the Alemanni robust and bigger, the Romans disciplined by the practice of arms, the Germans savage and tumultuous, the Romans calm and prudent, confident in their strength of character, whilst their adversaries were proud of their bodily splendour."

It is a striking picture.

And thus we reach the terrible years 275–276, which let loose upon Gaul the most terrible cataclysm. The Germans broke through the barrier of the Rhine at many points and spread themselves right and left in devastating hordes. The country was at their mercy. There were no garrisons, no fortresses, no arsenals. The invaders could sack, kill, burn, pillage, rob and violate at will. Far from encountering the armies of the enemy, these savage bands found crowds of the invaded population hurrying to swell their ranks—slaves escaped from the ergastula, workers who had been exploited by the Gallo-Roman autocracy and divers elements who had never been subjugated to the yoke of Rome. There followed a series of wild orgies, unbridled gluttony, unbridled lust, destruction and incendiарism. Sixty towns were destroyed, innumerable villas were pillaged and delivered up to the flames, whilst works of art patiently and tastefully collected for two centuries were reduced to fragments; crops were destroyed, women disembowelled, old men beaten to death, and babies' brains dashed out against the walls. Amid intoxicated yells torrents of crystal wine flowed from the beautiful Gallic casks. Of how many basilicas, thermæ, theatres, temples and other sanctuaries, granaries, cellars, wine stores, warehouses, shops, haylofts and barns, farms and dwellings of all kinds did not the walls blackened by fire alone remain to tell the tale ! The ruins of numbers of these villas may still be found beneath the burnt rubbish together with the bare bones of the inhabitants—hundreds of miniature Pompeii buried beneath the German flood more destructive than the lava flow of Vesuvius. And, proving how true was Fustel de Coulanges's assertion, the few fortified towns, such as Treves, Autun, Lyons and Narbonne, were spared. Paris was destroyed. Alas what a wonderful thing was the great majesty of the Pax Romana—immensa romana pacis majestas (Pliny the Naturalist)—hymned by poets and historians !

ROMAN GAUL

"This invasion," writes Camille Jullian, "destroyed almost all the towns in the three Gauls"; the Narbonnaise alone was spared.

It is true that under Probus there was a reaction. He was an intelligent Pannonian, rough and energetic, and seems to have been the best of all the Roman Emperors. Probus crossed the Rhine (277) and drove back the Germanic peoples to the Neckar, promising his soldiers a gold piece for every head of a German they brought him. He was able to write to the Senate that after having won back seventy cities, he had delivered Gaul. He brought back into Gaul a large number of Germans in chains in order to make them put the devastated fields into cultivation again. This forced exodus has been described by a contemporary writer, who watched these German immigrants in their chains during one of their halts lying pêle-mêle under the porticoes of a town. The men with their ruddy locks no longer had the savage gait which had terrified those who had seen them fifteen years previously spreading terror, torch in hand. Beneath the fetters that bound them, the young men and young girls maintained an air of freshness and good cheer and, in spite of their distressful situation, continued to exchange words and smiles of love.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Julian gained another victory over the Alemanni in the neighbourhood of Strasburg in 357, but after he left Gaul in order to wield the imperial sceptre in Constantinople, the invasions from across the Rhine began afresh. Julian died in 363, and Valentinian (364–375), in order to keep the barbarians more easily in check, took up his residence at Treves. Between Constantinople and Treves the defence of the Empire fluctuated over a vast sector. Valentinian spent most of his reign at Treves, and it was the same object—the struggle against the barbarians—which made Charlemagne choose Aix-la-Chapelle as the capital of his Empire. For half a century Treves once more became the capital of the Western Empire (from Diocletian onwards the Roman State was divided into two).

And now the struggle against the Germans was entrusted, partially at least, to the Germans themselves, which led, not only to their settlement in Gaul, but also to the formation of their kingdoms. And indeed the Romans adopted a better policy than that of incorporating the Teutons in more or less large numbers in the armies of the Empire, by handing over to Germanic peoples, organised in their own way, certain regions of Gaul to protect and defend.

This policy had been outlined as early as the first century n.c. by Julius Cæsar himself. The great proconsul had established the Germanic people, the Ubii, who were no less faithful allies of Rome than the Remi and the Lingones, in the region of Cologne, where they became Romanised to at least the same extent as their neighbours the Treveri. Hard by the Ubii, though further north and still on the Rhine, the Romans established the Sicambri about the end of the first century n.c. Remnants of the army of Arivistus had been left at Cæsar's pleasure in certain districts, the Triboci round about Strasbourg, the Vangiones at Worms and the Veneti at Spiers. Thus the Romans aimed at forming all along the valley of the Rhine, from Bâle to the sea, a line of defence consisting, not only of their own garrisons, but also of Germanic peoples under their protection.

In order to realise the consequences of this policy, which was put into practice as far as the interior of Gaul, let us consider for a moment how these colonies of Roman soldiers were organised. The legionaries were stationed in the districts they were expected to defend, and each man settled down with his wife, his children, his elders and his slaves; for under the Roman Empire the career of a soldier was a profession which lasted a considerable time. In the end soldiers even came to be branded with an indelible mark on their bodies to make it impossible for them to escape from their profession. In return for the protection afforded by the legionaries each district had to house and feed them. The region in which a band of troops was settled became, not its property, but its domain. The soldiers themselves together with their dependants had the right of being housed in it; this was called hospitalitas, and as a consequence they were allowed to requisition food, forage, beasts of burden and clothes.

ROMAN GAUL

In the course of time regular customs were established, and a landed proprietor was expected to devote to this " hospitality " a third of his dwellings and buildings of all kinds and produce in proportion to the revenue from his domains.

The consequences of this were as follows. When the Romans agreed that Germanic peoples should fulfil the same rôle as the legions, these peoples were treated in the same way. They were settled in regions the inhabitants of which were obliged to house, clothe and feed them. And these peoples established themselves there, like the legionaries, with their wives and their children. Thus the Romans, after having triumphed over the Burgondes, gave them Sabaudia, meaning that they installed them in that region in the manner just described. Gascony, Poitou, Perigord, Angoumois and Languedoc were " given " in the same way to the Visigoths. Consequently there soon arose in Gaul a kingdom of the Burgondes and a kingdom of the Visigoths, though in the beginning their chiefs were only called upon to exercise an authority in these parts similar to that which the Roman duces, that is to say, the Generals of the Roman armies garrisoned along the frontiers, exercised over the districts assigned to their command.

This lucid explanation is due to the brilliant genius of Fustel de Coulanges.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And the Empire did not only give the Germans lands to guard, they also gave them lands to cultivate. Whole districts had been turned into deserts as a result of the invasions, the effect of Roman law, and of the taxes which weighed heavily on the landed proprietors, and the ever-increasing difficulty experienced by the small proprietors to eke out an existence after the beginning of the third century.

It was not merely a question of bands of prisoners in chains that the legionaries conducted to the waste lands in order to force them to work there, but of solid masses of these immigrants from beyond the Rhine who were settled, not only in the frontier regions, but in the very heart of the country. A contemporary, filled with admiration, addressed a dithyramb on the subject to Maximianus Herculeius, the Emperor with the title of Augustus, and to Constantine Chlorus, his colleague (end of the third century) :

"Thanks to thee, Maximianus Augustus, the Frank, subjected to our laws, has cultivated the fields abandoned by the Nervii and the Treveri; thanks to thee, Constantine Caesar, all that remained uncultivated in the districts of Amiens, Beauvais, Troyes and Langres blossomed again under the care of barbarian tillers of the soil."

Towards the end of the third century another event took place in Gaul to which the attention of historians has not been adequately directed—the popular movement of the Bagaudæ. The word is derived from the Celtic bagad or bada, meaning "assembly." The Bagaudæ, Celtic by name, were peasants and labourers, free men for the most part. They joined together under arms, and their forces increased rapidly. Their weapons consisted of agricultural implements. About 285 Diocletian instructed Caesar Maximianus to fight them. Once more great massacres took place. Tradition has located the most important of these in the neighbourhood of Paris, at the confluence of the Marne and the Seine, in the plain of Saint Maur des Fossés. But the Bagaudæ were not exterminated. They reappeared fifty years later in the same guise as before, and it was the task of the great Actius to march against them at the head of his troops.

These events are among the most important of the period, but writers have not deigned to discuss them. With what disdain the Romans must have regarded these poor wretches armed with scythes and ploughshares ! But Salvienus adopts a different tone with regard to them :

ROMAN GAUL

“ If they were turned into Bagaudæ, it was owing to the corruption of the judges, the proscriptions and the peculation of those who, charged with raising the public dues, converted them to their own private use.”

It is important to remember the following facts—that the Bagaudæ were numerous, that they were rustics and determined in their efforts ; some scholars add that they spoke Celtic and that they were Christians.

After the terrible avalanche of the years 275–276, reconstruction could be the only possible aim ; the towns had to be Gaul in the rebuilt, the fields cultivated, and the bases of Fourth society re-established. This was the task of the Century. fourth century, approximately from the accession of Diocletian (284) to the death of Theodosius.

It was necessary to establish security. A terrible experience had taught men how fragile was the barrier of the Rhine and that each town and each domain must in future secure its own safety. This meant farewell to the smiling towns with their sumptuous edifices, their charming thermae and gigantic arenas. What was required for the future were strong fortifications and high walls. The space over which the town spread was reduced and confined to the central quarter. The remains of the funeral monuments which lined the approaches to the towns, forming beautiful avenues which had been sacked by the barbarians, were fitted into the foundations of the ramparts, to strengthen them, not only by means of their hard material but on account of their sacred character as funeral marbles and sculptured sarcophagi. The towns became fortresses, as well as numbers of villages and hamlets and the principal villas. The inhabitants from that time forward called them castra, fortified camps; strongholds and garrisons were stationed in them. They no longer relied upon a general system of defence depending on the good will of the Emperor, the valour of a general or the discipline of a legion. The historian would perhaps go too far in saying that the Middle Ages began in the fourth century, although it witnessed the same preoccupation with the problems of local defence which arose again during the centuries of anarchy after Charlemagne. Moreover, there was a great difference in the aims of the two periods, the men of the fourth century desiring to protect themselves against a common danger and the flood of invasions, those of the tenth always on the qui vive against private menace on the part of their neighbours.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Camille Julian has described the walls of Bordeaux, built of huge layers of enormous stones held together by their own weight alone. These blocks had been taken from the buildings of the town which had been ruined by the barbarians, forming quarries of architectural and artistic débris of all kinds—friezes, cornices, capitals, shafts of columns, fragments of statues, plinths and architraves. The lower parts of the walls were held together by the strong cement of the Romans. Lines of red brick broke up the monotony of the whole. The walls were from eighteen to twenty four feet thick and thirty to thirty six feet high and shut out the bright view over the smiling countryside and the neighbouring hills. The corners, which battering rams would quickly have demolished, were fortified by means of towers. "The square enclosure raises its proud towers so high that their tops cleave the clouds," writes the poet Ausonius. The gates were small, with straight lintels, mere holes in the walls.

The villas were also protected in the same way as the towns, as they had suffered even more than the latter beneath the flood of invasion. They were no longer pleasure resorts, as they had been in the second century, but fortified places, castra, camps after the Roman style, or at all events castella, whence the word "château". Villages became more rare, and the more important among them also protected themselves like the oppida which Cæsar had found in Gaul. And lo and behold! under the fair Pax Romana, Gaul bristled with fortified strongholds!

But it was not sufficient to have ramparts strengthened with towers, it was necessary also to have soldiers.

The Emperors of the first century, Vespasian and Domitian, thought they could secure the safety of Gaul by the construction of that barrier, known as the limes, which stretched the whole length of the frontier facing the barbarian world. This was not a wall, as has often been imagined, but a strategic road, a huge patrol road, with fortified gates, castella in which more or less important garrisons could find shelter. This road was protected on its further side by an embankment twelve to fifteen feet wide, bordered by a trench and palisade, followed by an open zone of about half a mile to a mile broad, devoid of buildings and trees. Along vast stretches of the limes sufficient defence was afforded by a river, like the Rhine, wherever there happened to be one. A fleet of boats keep constant watch up and down. It has been observed that the little forts with which the limes was protected—some fifty in number, most of which dated from the time of Drusus—that these castella were built in places which were more pleasant and convenient than strategically desirable.

ROMAN GAUL

The limes had been formed to prevent bands of marauders from making surprise sallies into the Empire rather than with the object of stopping attacks by armed forces. But above all it served as a Customs frontier to prevent the export of forbidden goods, more particularly arms, and of certain food commodities, and the passage of persons whose movements were subject to restriction.

But walls and ramparts required soldiers to guard them.

In the fourth century the profession of arms had fallen into disrepute. It was no longer held in respect. The reasons for this were various. With the growing menace of barbarian invasions it had become more dangerous, and at the same time military courage had weakened. Armies were beginning to be recruited from the ranks of adventurers of all kinds. From the time of Caracalla (beginning of the third century) all the subjects of the Empire were Roman citizens, a fact which robbed the military profession of its chief advantage. The Emperors tried to remedy this by making the profession hereditary, and, moreover, compulsorily hereditary, in the same way as the workmen's corporations and the senatorial curiæ were hereditary bodies. Valentinian (365) decreed that the sons of soldiers were to be soldiers; but compulsion had results which might easily have been foreseen—those who did not wish to obey had recourse to all manner of means for escaping military service.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The recruits deserted. They had to be pursued and traced to their hiding places, and those who gave them shelter had to be found out and punished. Young men cut off their right thumbs in order to make it impossible for them to hold a sword. The dearth of soldiers became so great that the Empire was forced to forbid the centurions to give their men any leave.

The land was tapped to provide its quota for military service. Every estate was called upon to furnish a number of men in proportion to its size, the small estates being grouped together to form a unit. And soon the State—and the landlord himself—preferred to replace the “ordinary” man by the “mercenary.” The rich kept their servants, and the State, by means of the money thus derived, procured recruits of better quality; and as such recruits, even in Gaul, became more and more rare, they were obtained from the barbarians. And thus it came about that the defence of the Empire against the Germans was entrusted to the Germans themselves.

This system filled Fustel de Coulanges with the deepest admiration. “By means of a slight increase in taxation,” he says, “military service was reduced to a minimum, and through this system of standing armies it might be said that the civil population enjoyed perfect peace to go about their business.”

We have just seen what was the price paid for this peace and security in 275 to 276, and before long we shall find them paying a far more terrible price.

Within the ramparts which surrounded the towns the life of the citizens was also modified. Camille Jullian writes:

“Behold the state of the country after three hundred years of Roman rule—the towns destroyed by the soldiers or by the Germans, the fields lying fallow, the population reduced by more than half, and misery and anarchy everywhere. Never was the soil of France more terribly devastated or more miserable than under the Roman Emperors.”

The inhabitants of Paris came down from Sainte Geneviève in order to shut themselves up in the Island of the City as they had done in the time of Camulogenus.

From the top of their narrow ramparts the citizens were able to contemplate in what had once more become a rural setting the ruins of their beautiful monuments. The artisans’ colleges crumbled into decay. The industrial arts, the making of pottery, iron, bronze and enamel work, fell into a state of decadence from which it seemed that nothing could rescue them. And the countryside afforded an even more desolate spectacle. The barbarians had ravaged everything, and destroyed the harvests, and the stores of corn as well as the grain for sowing, and ruined the vines and orchards; the strong men and youths had all been killed or reduced to slavery. And in the midst of this desperate misery bands of men out of work were formed. From the hiding-places in which they had taken refuge during the terror, from the depths of prehistoric grottoes, from the midst of the woods and from the picturesque huts which had still survived from the time of the lake-dwellings on the islands surrounded by the green waters of the marshes, emerged emaciated, half-starved creatures without any means of subsistence.

ROMAN GAUL

They were killed in thousands—a facile solution for social problems; but the result of thus dealing with the scourge was merely to deprive the countryside of the hands required for the grape and corn harvests.

In the midst of this anarchy the State endeavoured to confine society within rigid limits. From the top to the bottom of the social scale in this vast Empire men were forbidden to leave the position in which they were born. The slave was not only chained to slavery, but also to the house and to the estate on which he lived. If the property was sold he was not allowed to be separated from it. The cultivator who tilled his own land, which had often been given to him by the State as a reward for his services, was also forbidden to leave it. Those who worked on the domain of a landed proprietor were bound to it for ever, and the bonds which tied them to their master were made ever more rigid; the labourer could no longer part with his own property or even go to law without the consent of the master for whom he worked.

Not only in the country districts, but also in the camps and towns a deep desire for stability tended to make the whole of society static. Artisans found their colleges transformed into gaols in which they were kept captive by law. A beginning had been made with those bodies whose activities seemed to serve

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The recruits deserted. They had to be pursued and traced to their hiding places, and those who gave them shelter had to be found out and punished. Young men cut off their right thumbs in order to make it impossible for them to hold a sword. The dearth of soldiers became so great that the Empire was forced to forbid the centurions to give their men any leave.

The land was tapped to provide its quota for military service. Every estate was called upon to furnish a number of men in proportion to its size, the small estates being grouped together to form a unit. And soon the State—and the landlord himself—preferred to replace the “ordinary” man by the “mercenary.” The rich kept their servants, and the State, by means of the money thus derived, procured recruits of better quality; and as such recruits, even in Gaul, became more and more rare, they were obtained from the barbarians. And thus it came about that the defence of the Empire against the Germans was entrusted to the Germans themselves.

This system filled Fustel de Coulanges with the deepest admiration. “By means of a slight increase in taxation,” he says, “military service was reduced to a minimum, and through this system of standing armies it might be said that the civil population enjoyed perfect peace to go about their business.”

We have just seen what was the price paid for this peace and security in 275 to 276, and before long we shall find them paying a far more terrible price.

Within the ramparts which surrounded the towns the life of the citizens was also modified. Camille Jullian writes:

“Behold the state of the country after three hundred years of Roman rule—the towns destroyed by the soldiers or by the Germans, the fields lying fallow, the population reduced by more than half, and misery and anarchy everywhere. Never was the soil of France more terribly devastated or more miserable than under the Roman Emperors.”

The inhabitants of Paris came down from Sainte Geneviève in order to shut themselves up in the Island of the City as they had done in the time of Camulogenus.

From the top of their narrow ramparts the citizens were able to contemplate in what had once more become a rural setting the ruins of their beautiful monuments. The artisans’ colleges crumbled into decay. The industrial arts, the making of pottery, iron, bronze and enamel work, fell into a state of decadence from which it seemed that nothing could rescue them. And the countryside afforded an even more desolate spectacle. The barbarians had ravaged everything, and destroyed the harvests, and the stores of corn as well as the grain for sowing, and ruined the vines and orchards; the strong men and youths had all been killed or reduced to slavery. And in the midst of this desperate misery bands of men out of work were formed. From the hiding-places in which they had taken refuge during the terror, from the depths of prehistoric grottoes, from the midst of the woods and from the picturesque huts which had still survived from the time of the lake-dwellings on the islands surrounded by the green waters of the marshes, emerged emaciated, half-starved creatures without any means of subsistence.

ROMAN GAUL

They were killed in thousands—a facile solution for social problems; but the result of thus dealing with the scourge was merely to deprive the countryside of the hands required for the grape and corn harvests.

In the midst of this anarchy the State endeavoured to confine society within rigid limits. From the top to the bottom of the social scale in this vast Empire men were forbidden to leave the position in which they were born. The slave was not only chained to slavery, but also to the house and to the estate on which he lived. If the property was sold he was not allowed to be separated from it. The cultivator who tilled his own land, which had often been given to him by the State as a reward for his services, was also forbidden to leave it. Those who worked on the domain of a landed proprietor were bound to it for ever, and the bonds which tied them to their master were made ever more rigid; the labourer could no longer part with his own property or even go to law without the consent of the master for whom he worked.

Not only in the country districts, but also in the camps and towns a deep desire for stability tended to make the whole of society static. Artisans found their colleges transformed into gaols in which they were kept captive by law. A beginning had been made with those bodies whose activities seemed to serve return to the mythology of Olympus was accomplished without friction in remembrance of the poetie grace with which the finest literature in the world had filled his soul during the years when as a young man he had lived in Athens, the seat of that charming renaissance of Hellenism in the fourth century, listening to the light debates of the sophists, the lively disputes of the scholars, and the glowing verses of the greatest poets of the world gathered together in his honour. To this garden of brilliant flowers Julian returned with a free and easy gait which we of to-day can but greet with an indulgent smile.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In addition to the brilliant charm shed by Julian the Apostate over Gaul in the fourth century we must also bear in mind the contribution made by Ausonius of Bordeaux. The celebrated poet was born in that town about 310, in the reign of Constantine. It was possible to dream of a new era. The cult of letters held a high place, and Ausonius was destined to enjoy a brilliant career thanks to his talent and the favour it secured him. At the age of twenty-five he was a professor in the school at Bordeaux. Aquitania had suffered relatively less than the other provinces. Its lands were rich, and the district recovered very quickly.

The schools of Bordeaux enjoyed a great reputation. Their rhetoricians were spread over Italy and the East, and even became teachers in the Imperial household. The public bodies lavished favours on these schools, and they are well known to us from the poetry of Ausonius. He was a duumvir of the city, perhaps a "defender," according to the term already in use.

The University of Bordeaux, moreover, existed for a considerable time; we find it still flourishing in the fifth century, in spite of the arrival in the district of the Visigoths, who attended its courses and held its professors in high esteem. It only disappeared with the advent of the Franks.

To return to Ausonius—after having won the highest honours in his native city, he was appointed tutor to Gratian, the son of the Emperor Valentinian, in 369, and received the title of Count in honour of the occasion. He afterwards became Commander of the Praetorian Guard and, in 378, Prefect of Gaul. And thus we find the poet holding important public offices, and placed at the head of the civil administration of the country. His authority extended from Mt. Atlas to the Moselle; for the Commander of the Praetorians in Gaul held command in Great Britain, Spain and Moroeeo. On the 1st of January, 379, Ausonius was at last honoured with the title of consul, and he almost died of joy. The consular attributes had become little more than honorary, but, next to the glory of the Imperial purple, this honour was the greatest to which a man could aspire.

ROMAN GAUL

Ausonius was the greatest poet of his day, and yet his work leaves us cold. It is artificial. It is true that we find in it an echo of society at that time, when the poet speaks, so superficially, alas ! of his dear villa, his family life, and his colleagues at the University; but it fails to arouse our emotions. In order to judge his verses at a glance it is only necessary to compare him with Gregory of Tours. The latter is incorrect and heavy in his writing, he indulges in the crassest tomfoolery in order to tell us tales which do not actually bore us because it is impossible not to be amused by them, but which bear witness to his vulgar simplicity of mind. Ausonius is refined, intelligent and fluent, he knew all sides of society and had taken part in the most important events of his day, and had sometimes presided over them. And yet what remains to us after all this versification?—ashes and verbiage, sometimes harmonious but more often limping; and in spite of all its honours, brilliancy and variety, depicting an empty life, full of vanity, though endowed, it is true, with a certain familiar grace of language and rhetorique. Whilst with Gregory of Tours—what floods, by Jove, overflowing into swirling eddies, carrying everything including ourselves along, and in which we love to plunge again and again up to our necks! For Gregory followed a very different current from that in which the bard of Bordeaux so skilfully guided his bark. For whilst Ausonius and his contemporaries among the aristocracy of Gaul delighted in the play of wit, and towards the end of the fourth century lived in the villas they had rebuilt an agreeable life enriched by a light literature and frivolous arts, surrounded by every comfort it was possible to desire, the honest life so well described by the grandson of Ausonius “in a convenient dwelling, with large rooms arranged for the various seasons of the year, a clean and well spread board, young slaves and plenty of them, abundant furniture, precious silver, artists of all kinds, stables full of horses with shining coats, safe and elegant carriages"—the Christian populace of Bordeaux were already stoning a heretic, and St Hilary was preaching at Poitiers. Hilary was inspiring with the enthusiasm of his faith his disciple Martin, the soldier who had come from far distant Hungary, the rough apostle who was to rouse the restless mobs, the military tribune who, to the consternation of the rich cooped up in their barren egoism, shared his woollen cloak on the Amiens road with a poor wretch shrivelled up with cold and hunger.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The populace came and tore Martin away from his ascetic life in order to place him, all pale as he was, covered with rags, with unkempt locks and looking like a Bohemian vagabond, with emaciated features and ecstatic gaze, upon the episcopal throne of Tours, and that in spite of the Bishops who were taking part in the election and who considered that even for a popular Bishop, this personage was really a bit too much of a guy.

In the market place of the town a sick man remarked to Brice who was destined in his turn to become Bishop of Tours

"I am waiting for the sainted man, but I don't know where he is"

—"You are looking for that lunatic? . . . See over there, that creature who as usual is gazing at the sky like a man deprived of his senses "

The policy and influence of this mitred son of the people became tremendously powerful. The energy of his will, the passion of his convictions, his biting and brutal eloquence in which, nevertheless, his infinite goodness shone forth, his sublime disinterestedness, his unaffected voluntary poverty, triumphed over every obstacle. Only compare Saint Martin with Julius Cæsar and you will at once realise the pettiness, the mediocrity of a vulgar and ambitious mind and the empty vanity of the old imperator who hid his premature baldness beneath a laurel wreath of gold . . .

Saint Martin bestowed upon Gaul those two great mainsprings of the new life—the monasteries and the rural parishes. Miracles abounded wherever he trod, and after his death signs and wonders were continually repeated at his tomb when his relied were touched. Pilgrims came from every quarter of Christendom chanting their hymns. The atrium of the basilica was filled night and day with swarms of invalids, the blind and those suffering from fever and hysteria. There were paralytics stretched out on their long litters, awaiting a cure, and remaining in the sacred enclosure for days, weeks and even months. Nearly all the churches in central and south-western Gaul were dedicated in the name of the venerated saint.

ROMAN GAUL

The aristocracy fled from the towns, which were full of a populace vibrating with Christian ideas, and took refuge in the country, in their gilded villas, and their pleasant amusements, and, to the distant thunder of the new religion, sadly contemplated their Roman gods on their marble altars, calling to mind the delightful spicy tales of these divinities with their various attributes, in whom they no longer believed, though it is true they had never believed in them before. There they led a life of hunting, and riding, with packs of dogs whose genealogies were recorded, playing tennis and wrestling, varied with games of dice and hot and cold baths. They listened to light lectures stretched out on couches covered with wolf skins, and attended endless banquets at which sows' udders were washed down with Falernian wine to the sound of the zither and the flute.

Meanwhile neither the senators, the praetors nor the duumvirs, nor even the "defender" who had replaced the duumvirs, any longer governed the cities, which were now ruled by the Bishops elected by the people and speaking the language and preaching the religion of the people. The people of France had burst its bonds. It had come out into the light. Let us listen to its voice. It had been dumb ever since the days of Vereingetorix, of Commius the Atrebatic and of Corres the Belluvacan, except for certain paltry revolts which had been smothered in blood. For a moment its voice was heard again; listen carefully, for all too soon this beautiful voice will be drowned beneath the tumult of the barbarians, until the day when, towards the end of the tenth century, it will appear once again the master of its own destiny, at last unfolding freely, until our own times, the fairest of all the histories of the world.

In pointing to this renaissance of the Western world in the midst of the ruins of the Gallo-Roman society, whose decadence well-spread board, young slaves and plenty of them, abundant furniture, precious silver, artists of all kinds, stables full of horses with shining coats, safe and elegant carriages"—the Christian populace of Bordeaux were already stoning a heretic, and St. Hilary was preaching at Poitiers. Hilary was inspiring with the enthusiasm of his faith his disciple Martin, the soldier who had come from far distant Hungary, the rough apostle who was to rouse the restless mobs, the military tribune who, to the consternation of the rich cooped up in their barren egoism, shared his woollen cloak on the Amiens road with a poor wretch shrivelled up with cold and hunger.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The populace came and tore Martin away from his ascetic life in order to place him, all pale as he was, covered with rags, with unkempt locks and looking like a Bohemian vagabond, with emaciated features and ecstatic gaze, upon the episcopal throne of Tours, and that in spite of the Bishops who were taking part in the election and who considered that even for a popular Bishop, this personage was really a bit too much of a guy.

In the market-place of the town a sick man remarked to Brice who was destined in his turn to become Bishop of Tours :

"I am waiting for the sainted man, but I don't know where he is."

—" You are looking for that lunatic? . . . See over there, that creature who as usual is gazing at the sky like a man deprived of his senses. . . ."

The policy and influence of this mitred son of the people became tremendously powerful. The energy of his will, the passion of his convictions, his biting and brutal eloquence in which, nevertheless, his infinite goodness shone forth, his sublime disinterestedness, his unaffected voluntary poverty, triumphed over every obstacle. Only compare Saint Martin with Julius Cæsar and you will at once realise the pettiness, the mediocrity of a vulgar and ambitious mind and the empty vanity of the old imperator who hid his premature baldness beneath a laurel wreath of gold. . . .

Saint Martin bestowed upon Gaul those two great mainsprings of the new life—the monasteries and the rural parishes. Miracles abounded wherever he trod, and after his death signs and wonders were continually repeated at his tomb when his relics were touched. Pilgrims came from every quarter of Christendom chanting their hymns. The atrium of the basilica was filled night and day with swarms of invalids, the blind and those suffering from fever and hysteria. There were paralytics stretched out on their long litters, awaiting a cure, and remaining in the sacred enclosure for days, weeks and even months. Nearly all the churches in central and south-western Gaul were dedicated in the name of the venerated saint.

ROMAN GAUL

The aristocracy fled from the towns, which were full of a populace vibrating with Christian ideas, and took refuge in the country, in their gilded villas, and their pleasant amusements, and, to the distant thunder of the new religion, sadly contemplated their Roman gods on their marble altars, calling to mind the delightful spicy tales of these divinities with their various attributes, in whom they no longer believed, though it is true they had never believed in them before. There they led a life of hunting, and riding, with packs of dogs whose genealogies were recorded, playing tennis and wrestling, varied with games of dice and hot and cold baths. They listened to light lectures stretched out on couches covered with wolf skins, and attended endless banquets at which sows' udders were washed down with Falernian wine to the sound of the zither and the flute.

Meanwhile neither the senators, the prætors nor the duumvirs, nor even the "defender" who had replaced the duumvirs, any longer governed the cities, which were now ruled by the Bishops elected by the people and speaking the language and preaching the religion of the people. The people of France had burst its bonds. It had come out into the light. Let us listen to its voice. It had been dumb ever since the days of Vercingetorix, of Commius the Atrebatic and of Corres the Bellovacan, except for certain paltry revolts which had been smothered in blood. For a moment its voice was heard again; listen carefully, for all too soon this beautiful voice will be drowned beneath the tumult of the barbarians, until the day when, towards the end of the tenth century, it will appear once again the master of its own destiny, at last unfolding freely, until our own times, the fairest of all the histories of the world.

In pointing to this renaissance of the Western world in the midst of the ruins of the Gallo-Roman society, whose decadence well-spread board, young slaves and plenty of them, abundant furniture, precious silver, artists of all kinds, stables full of horses with shining coats, safe and elegant carriages"—the Christian populace of Bordeaux were already stoning a heretic, and St. Hilary was preaching at Poitiers. Hilary was inspiring with the enthusiasm of his faith his disciple Martin, the soldier who had come from far distant Hungary, the rough apostle who was to rouse the restless mobs, the military tribune who, to the consternation of the rich cooped up in their barren egoism, shared his woollen cloak on the Amiens road with a poor wretch shrivelled up with cold and hunger.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The populace came and tore Martin away from his ascetic life in order to place him, all pale as he was, covered with rags, with unkempt locks and looking like a Bohemian vagabond, with emaciated features and ecstatic gaze, upon the episcopal throne of Tours, and that in spite of the Bishops who were taking part in the election and who considered that even for a popular Bishop, this personage was really a bit too much of a guy.

In the market-place of the town a sick man remarked to Brice who was destined in his turn to become Bishop of Tours :

"I am waiting for the sainted man, but I don't know where he is."

—" You are looking for that lunatic? . . . See over there, that creature who as usual is gazing at the sky like a man deprived of his senses. . . ."

The policy and influence of this mitred son of the people became tremendously powerful. The energy of his will, the passion of his convictions, his biting and brutal eloquence in which, nevertheless, his infinite goodness shone forth, his sublime disinterestedness, his unaffected voluntary poverty, triumphed over every obstacle. Only compare Saint Martin with Julius Cæsar and you will at once realise the pettiness, the mediocrity of a vulgar and ambitious mind and the empty vanity of the old imperator who hid his premature baldness beneath a laurel wreath of gold. . . .

Saint Martin bestowed upon Gaul those two great mainsprings of the new life—the monasteries and the rural parishes. Miracles abounded wherever he trod, and after his death signs and wonders were continually repeated at his tomb when his relics were touched. Pilgrims came from every quarter of Christendom chanting their hymns. The atrium of the basilica was filled night and day with swarms of invalids, the blind and those suffering from fever and hysteria. There were paralytics stretched out on their long litters, awaiting a cure, and remaining in the sacred enclosure for days, weeks and even months. Nearly all the churches in central and south-western Gaul were dedicated in the name of the venerated saint.

ROMAN GAUL

THE EARLIEST TIMES

we have described, it is seldom realised that this society did not really enter upon a stage of decadence, for the very good reason that it had never risen any higher than it was at the end of the fourth century. It had always been factitious and artificial when once it had been uprooted from its native soil and grafted upon a foreign culture. The world, it is maintained, was regenerated by the Germans. But the Germans, as we shall see, regenerated nothing at all, because they would have had to begin by regenerating themselves. On this point the proof brought forward by Fustel de Coulanges admits of no reply. Then if society was not regenerated by the Germans, it must have been regenerated by Christianity? This contention is truer; but the value of a doctrine depends on the men who champion it, on those who are its incarnation and of whom it is the expression. Now what was Christianity at the end of the fourth century? It was the people of France who pushed it forward with all the life and power that had remained within them. With a wave of the hand they cast down the Roman edifice which had lasted all too long. All that remained of it were certain insignificant shapes, words and formulæ. Gaul was regenerated by the Gauls.

Of the work of Rome all that was left was that which Christianity wished to keep—in the first place the administrative framework. The bishoprics were founded on the old cities, the Roman civitates, the archbishoprics on the provinces; but we have already seen that the Roman cities were merely the continuation of the old districts inhabited by the Gallic peoples. There were also the basilicas in which the Christians were to celebrate their religion and which, moreover, were quickly transformed.

A few ceremonial details were also kept, such as those connected with marriage—the ring, the nuptial veil, the crowns on the heads of the bridal pair; as well as certain details in ecclesiastical dress—the priest's alb being derived from the Roman tunic, the chasuble from the pennula. But these were insignificant items. In its schools and monasteries Christianity saved the remnants of Roman culture, the classic language of the writers—the only salvage from a vast wreck.

If to this we add the roads, which were themselves built on the tracks of the old Gallic roads, we shall have included everything. And it amounts to nothing ! The argument of language is being continually brought up ; French, it is maintained, is simply Latin. But in the first place it is not the Latin of Roman civilisation ; the Latin from which French is supposed to be derived has nothing in common with Virgil and Cicero, nor even with the code, the pandects and the digests. And what did the Gauls do with it ? They inspired it with their own genius, spirit and temperament, only preserving its empty shell. "France," says Jullian, "only kept the Latin language on condition of transforming it into its proper shape." By this we mean, of course, the beautiful pure French of the lays and fables and of the first chroniclers, the French of Villehardouin and Joinville, and not the language that began to be corrupted by the Burgundian and Flemish writers of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, Froissard, Chastellain, Jacques de Guyse and Olivier de la Marche, and was later on even more terribly mutilated by the humanists of the Renaissance. What fine writers Ronsard and Rabelais would have been had they not spoilt their language with such a large admixture of antiquity !

ROMAN GAUL

- In its essence and construction and its innate character Latin is allied to German, with its declensions, its three genders, the position of the complements in a sentence, and the part played by the tonic accent, much more than to French. To maintain that the French of the Chanson de Roland was derived from Latin amounts to saying that Rheims Cathedral or the dungeon of Coucy were inspired by the Capitol and the forum. Moreover, we have seen that popular Latin had been imported into Gaul, not by the Romans, but by Christianity. "Let us say no more about the Latin genius," exclaims Jullian, "or about France being the pupil of that genius. She is worth more than that."

Let us make no mistake about it; Christianity in Gaul of the fourth century was a revolutionary movement, much more nearly akin than one might believe to the Revolution of '89 and founded upon the same principles of Liberty, Equality and Fraternity. The element of violence was excluded from it, because it was not led by ambitious politicians, greedy of power and gain ; it was compounded entirely of faith, enthusiasm and love. Far from reaching its goal through ambition, it triumphed by means of devotion, renunciation and sacrifice—Saint Martin.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

"It was a strange spectacle," writes Camille Jullian, "that was presented by Gaul at the end of the fourth century. On one side the barbarians, who formed the armies of the Empire, on the other Roman society, entirely civilian, one might almost say intellectual, which gave to men of letters most of its wealth and authority";—but this authority passed into the hands of the Bishops. Between the barbarian armies on the one hand, and on the other the intellectual but uninfluential society of the Roman Empire, was the mass of the people who, as Jullian tells us, lived outside the pale of Latin culture; the plebeians and the peasants, the Gallic people, had once more found themselves beneath the aegis of Christianity.

And again, as Camille Jullian most aptly remarks, "Rome, after having deprived Gaul of her national existence, destroyed even her works and the very memory of her own history. It laid her low in the present, obliterated her past, and postponed her natural destiny.

"But Nature in the end imposes her will upon men, and the dead force themselves upon the minds of the living. Rome had not been able to destroy the native forces of Gaul nor those to which the unremitting toil of bygone generations had once given birth. These forces were destined to reappear and become active once more when the Roman Empire in its turn began to crumble to decay."

The agents of the Revolution of 1789 were elected by the people composing the National Assemblies—the Constituent and the Legislative Assemblies and the Convention; the agents of the Christian revolution of the fourth century were also elected by the people—the Bishop in each city. The Bishop was the sovereign head of the municipality. The "defenders" elected by the curia, the "Counts" nominated by the State, sank into insignificance beside him. Moreover, the defenders, who filled the first and most important office in the city, were in reality the nominees of the Bishop, on account of the influence the latter had in the assembly that elected them and of which he was the president. The same applies to the nomination of curators. In the fourth century it was the Bishop who exercised the only really strong authority in Gaul, because his was the only authority which rested upon popular foundations. He directed the administration of the city, acted as judge and arranged for the feeding of the people.

ROMAN GAUL

Nevertheless Christianity triumphant had yet to deal with further adversaries. According to Salvienus, "Minerva continued to be held in honour in the schools, Venus in the theatre, Neptune in the circuses, Mars in the amphitheatres, and Mercury in the palæstras." But they were merely gods on paper. Much more serious was the opposition of the old Gallic divinities, with their sanctuaries hidden away beneath the tall trees and served by priests who lived by means of the forbidden cult. The emblems of the rustic gods were still carried across the fields for the blessing of the harvests beneath great white palls; the lakes still received their offerings; and if the sacrifices did not call for the spilling of human blood in honour of the legendary deities, they were at all events still very numerous. And it will be readily understood that the Christians resolutely tracked down these obstinate survivals, not only by proscribing the old Druidical practices, but by trying to make the followers of the condemned religion forget the very language they used.

The Bishops of the cities met with adversaries of another kind in the monks of the great monasteries which developed on a prodigious scale in Gaul in the fourth century.

Saint Martin was a monk as well as a Bishop, but the other Bishops encountered great rivalry in the work of the monasteries. They tried to extend their authority over them; but the monks resisted. Cassian advised the monks to avoid women and Bishops. This conflict between the世俗s and the regulars continued to develop with various vicissitudes; but the Bishops and the monks nevertheless fulfilled a common task; there were the episcopal schools and the literary activities of the monasteries, the great works undertaken by the Bishops for the defence, the extension and the sanitation of the towns and the magnificent task of clearing the land carried out by the monks; whilst moral teaching was inculcated by both branches with equal ardour and success.

Moreover, both the Bishops and the monks were united in the fight against Arianism, which was one of the most important phenomena of the period and entailed most serious consequences

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Arianism first came into being in Alexandria about 318. It was a question of explaining the mystery of the Trinity composed of three Persons, each one of whom was God, but who together were but one God. Tertullian had taught that Christ was an emanation from the Father, "proceeding from the Father before the creation of the world, but not from all eternity"—"God existed before everything he created, therefore he was not always Father. For he could not be Father before the birth of the Son. There was a time when the Son did not exist." It is not our intention to enter upon a theological discussion. Suffice it to say that the doctrine of Tertullian was taken up by Arius in opposition to Origen, who maintained that the Word, that is to say Christ, had existed from all eternity like the Father. Moreover, Origen denied that the Son was of the same essence as the Father.

After having adopted the doctrine of Tertullian, Arius also adopted the second half of the doctrine of Origen. Alexander, Bishop of Alexandria, set to work to attack him, and the conflict opened. Was Christ in His beginning eternal like the Father and of the same substance as the Father, or was He merely an emanation from the Father?

This was the theological problem which was to play such a prodigious part in the destiny of the world and more particularly in the fate of France.

Even in our own day, the brigands of Abyssinia who, in the interval between two plundering expeditions and several murders, contrive to rob the caravans, when they sit round their bivouac fire at night still have hot discussions on the problem of consubstantiality.

The birth of Arius is shrouded in obscurity. He seems to have been born in Libya or in Cyrenaica in the second half of the third century (between 256 and 270). He was ordained priest and just failed to be elected Bishop of Alexandria about 312, Alexander being his successful rival.

It was from an explanation of the Trinity given in 318 by the Bishop of Alexandria in an assembly of the clergy that the doctrine of Arius sprang. Alexander tried to explain to his priests how it was that the three Persons, the three Gods of the Trinity, were but one God. Arius took great pains in trying to understand the arguments of his Bishop. But this was the greatest mistake he could have made. For he did not understand. It seemed to him impossible, if the Father, as the Bishop assured him, had begotten the Son, that He should not have preceded the Son. It also seemed to him impossible that the Son should be of the same substance as the Father, since God was by definition the only one of His kind and indivisible. Whereupon he set to work to organise conferences in which he tried to prove that the Word, that is to say the Son, had been created by the Father. "Then the Son was a created being," objected his opponents.

ROMAN GAUL

Bishop Alexander summoned a council of over a hundred Bishops from Egypt and Lybia. The majority were in agreement with him that the Word had existed from all eternity like the Father; the minority shared the opinion of Arius. The latter section gradually found their supporters increasing in numbers, including priests and votaries of all kinds, among whom were "seven hundred virgins." Arius gathered them all together and founded a schism.

Arius seems to have been a charming man, tall and thin and with a pale face which looked as though it were illumined by an inner flame; the expression of his eyes and the tone of his voice were extremely sweet. With his limpid melancholy he possessed the gift of persuasion. He was a poet and a musician. He put his doctrines into various popular refrains, some suitable for fishermen, others for millers, merchants or boatmen, refrains which were suited to the different tones of voice among the people. His numerous disciples used to chant them at table at the end of the meal.

The doctrine of Arius was accepted by some of the Emperors, including Constantine the Great; it obtained the approval of more than one Council, and even of one of the Popes, Liberius, whom martyrology has included in the ranks of the saints. Arian missionaries converted the Visigoths, the Ostrogoths, the Burgundians and the Lombards; but the charming Emperor Julian, disgusted by all the squabbles between the Arians and the Orthodox, deserted Christianity in order to return to the overlooked. In addition to his agricultural activities and all the industrial work necessary for his own subsistence and that of his people, he maintained a permanent troop of armed men. Jacques Flach writes that about his double capacity of landed proprietor and general of an army there could be no doubt. His troop of soldiers was formed from his familia—the mesne of the eleventh century—slaves, cultivators and free clients, the latter being the vassals. The free clients, the vassals, served on horseback, the others on foot. The members of the familia were bound to the “senator” by oath, just as the vassals were afterwards bound to their overlord. If necessary the “senator” supplemented them by means of mercenaries. In his case might was right, and he usurped and exercised an authority that no one was strong enough to dispute, so that he became, not only a landed proprietor and a military chief, but, if he so desired, a judge and legislator as well.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But this exactly describes the feudal lord of the eleventh and twelfth centuries. One last feature completes the likeness—the extension of the patronate by the ties of vassalage.

“The weak,” says Salvienus, “handed themselves over to the powerful, in order to be defended and protected by him.” Salvienus waxes indignant at the thought, and gives us the most precise details on the matter.

“In order to obtain this protection,” he writes, “the miserable wretch had to hand over almost everything he possessed to the man whose protection he sought. The support given to the father cost the children their heritage. And thus countless numbers of the poor were despoiled of their small possessions.” And, what made matters worse, these unfortunate people were still forced to pay taxes on goods they no longer possessed. For they were taxed as before.

And thus the free population gradually dwindled in number and whole towns put themselves under the patronage of a suzerain. All this sheds a bright light upon the formation of mediæval feudalism, though the latter was animated by a moral force from whence there sprang a most fertile social life bound together by a reciprocity of rights and duties between the weak and the strong.

To this movement of concentration in the hands of the great the Emperors would have liked to offer a strenuous opposition; but in order to prevent the minores, to use a mediæval term, from seeking the protection of the strong at the expense of their own property and liberty, the Roman State would have had to give them protection itself; and of this it was incapable.

ROMAN GAUL

“The peoples of Gaul,” writes Zosimus, “detached themselves from the authority of Rome, and tried to be sufficient unto themselves, fighting for their own interests and dismissing the Roman officials in order to govern themselves in their own way.”

From these numerous similarities between the great Gallo-Roman domain of the fourth and fifth centuries and the fief of the eleventh and twelfth, it would seem that the latter was the child of the former, its continuation, or at all events its transformation. This is a conclusion which naturally occurs to the mind, and the majority of historians have allowed themselves to be seduced by it. Nevertheless we do not agree with it.

We have already seen how feudalism was established in Gaul in the time of Cæsar similar in every way to the feudalism of the Middle Ages. After Cæsar it was destroyed by several centuries of Roman rule, so that Gallo-Roman feudalism certainly did not spring from it, any more than did the feudalism of the eleventh and twelfth centuries from that of the fourth and fifth. Similar circumstances produce similar results. In a time of insecurity and in the absence of protection afforded by the State, local patronates are formed, public authority is split up between private individuals and under the same conditions; for human nature is very simple and in similar circumstances passes through a similar evolution.

The farmers had become cultivators. The cultivator was not a slave, nor even a serf. He was recognised as a free man, but he was not allowed to leave his land, any more than a soldier was allowed to leave the colours. Moreover, he enjoyed all the rights of citizenship, like a soldier. He was a free man, but chained down—the law speaks of the nexus colonarius, the bond of the cultivator.

This state of affairs possessed great disadvantages, which are obvious at a glance; but it also had advantages. The cultivator clerics and the monasteries had their slaves, and the Councils devised the means of securing their possession. But the Church endeavoured to ameliorate their lot. For the mere fact that she preached the equality of all men before God in a society where the new faith was very strong resulted in accomplishing much towards their future emancipation, and by this means rural slavery was transformed into serfdom of the soil. The change did not take place all at once, by virtue of any single law, sovereign decree, or general consent. We have seen that troops of slaves worked on the large domains, and it often happened that one or other of these bands became allotted to the cultivation of a particular piece of land, and thus the slave became a serf. And, by an inverse process, more than one free cultivator, hereditarily attached to the cultivation of a particular spot, saw his holding transformed into serfdom, even if it were only because the ground he worked did not suffice to support him, and he himself desired the change in his position.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Lastly, outside the various social classes we have just described, the people properly so called, the inhabitants of the towns and the country districts, lived outside the limits we have outlined. We know little about them. The rich alone knew how to write, or rather they were the only people who were written about. They could still take an interest in the cultivators, the freedmen, and even the slaves who formed part of the social hierarchy of which they, the rich, were the highest in the scale, but these vague, floating masses, who had nothing in common with them, failed altogether to rouse their interest.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Works of Catullus, Julius Caesar, Cicero, Dio Cassius, Jordanes, Plutarch's Life of Caesar, Apollonius Sidonius, Strabo, Suetonius' Life of Caesar, Tacitus, various editions Barthélémy, Alesia, son véritable emplacement, from Recueil des questions hist., 1867 Ernest Desjardins, Géographie hist. et Administrative de la Gaule romaine, 1870-93 Aug Longnon, Études sur les pagi de la Gaule, 1869 Am Thierry, La Littérature profane en Gaule au IV^e siècle, Revue des Deux Mondes, 1873 Boissier, Les Rhéteurs gaulois au IV^e siècle, Journal d'archéologie, 1873-74 Cam Julliand, l'in du paganisme, 1891 Cam Julliand, et la bataille de Lyon, Recueil hist., 1889 Denis, from Bibli de l'Éc des Clares, 1890 Am Thierry, Hist. de la Gaule sous la domination romaine, 4th ed. 1878 Hirschfeld, Lyon in der Römerzeit, 1878 Cam Julian, Ausone et son temps 1891 Friedländer, Gallien und ihre Kultur unter die Römer, Deutsche Rundschau, 1877, Fustel de Coulanges, La Gaule Romaine, 1891. Cam. Jullian, Gallia, tableau sommaire de la Gaule sous la domination romaine, 1892. Jullian, Le Fondateur de Lyon, Munatius Plancus, 1892. Cam. Jullian, Ausone et Bordeaux, 1893. Hirschfeld, Aquitaniens in der Römerzeit, 1896. Mohl, Introduction à la chronologie du latin vulgaire, 1899. Mohl, Les Origines romanes, 1900. R. Holmes, Cæsar's conquest of Gaul, 1899. Guglielmo Ferrero, Grandeur et décadence de Rome, 1903, sq. 5 vols. C. Bayet, Le Christianisme, in Hist. de France, edited by E. Lavisse, 1903. Ém. Esperandieu, Recueil général des bas-reliefs de la Gaule romaine, 1907–1910, 3 vols. Cam. Jullian, Hist. de la Gaule, 1908, sq. 6 vols. Bonnard, La Gaule thermale, 1908. [Maxime Petit], Histoire de France illustrée, 1909. De Pachtere, Paris à l'époque gallo-romaine, 1912. J. Morin, La Verrerie en Gaule sous l'empire romain, 1913. Fr. Cumont, Comment la Belgique fut romanisée, Ann. Soc. archéol. de Bruxelles, 1914. Cam. Jullian, Vercingétorix, 6th ed., 1914. Cam. Jullian, De la Gaule en France, 1922. Aug. Longnon, La Formation de l'unité française, 1922. P. Imbart de la Tour, Histoire politique des Origines à 1515, in Hist. de la Nation française, edited by Gabr. Hanotaux [1922]. Cam. Jullian, Le Paris des Romains, 1925.

ROMAN GAUL

CHAPTER IV

THE MEROVINGIANS

The great invasions The Alemanni occupy Alsace The Franks take Cologne and Treves (418) Clodion The Burgundians installed as occupants of the valley of the Rhone and the Franks north of the Somme Attila and his Huns Aetius His victory on the Catalaunian Plains (June 4th, 451) Clovis A royal brigand History of his reign How he became a Catholic and conquered part of Gaul Saint Clotilda Gregory of Tours A great prince Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths His letters to Clovis Intervention of the Emperor of the East The Gallo-Roman aristocracy is not deprived of its lands The sons of Clovis Character of each of them They divide their father's kingdom between them, but one of them, Clotar, re-unites it under his own rule after the death of his brothers The great man of the group Theodebert, grandson of Clovis His expeditions into Italy, his designs on the throne of the East Fresh partition between the grandsons of Clovis A bloodthirsty dilettante Chilperic, King of Neustria Galswinthe Fredegonde Brunehaut Murder of Galswinthe War of Chilperic against his brother Sigebert, King of Austrasia Gontran, King of the Burgundians Clotar II sole King Torture of Brunehaut The good King Dagobert The decline of the Merovingians Mayors of the Palace and Sluggard Kings The Bishops their authority, their power, their moral, political and social influence They are the real leaders of the people The great Merovingian domains and immunity

WE have seen how the barbarians, in addition to their terrible invasions, succeeded in making a peaceful penetration of Gaul Established there as cultivators, they lived under the protection of Roman Law, but were regarded as citizens of inferior rank The law forbade marriage between a Gaul and a German woman, just as it did between a free man and a slave

The Great Invasions The Germans presented themselves in large numbers on the frontiers, demanding admission into the state.

THE MEROVINGIANS

work of the Roman Empire. In 370, the Emperor Valentinian informed the Burgundians that he wished to raise several thousand recruits from among them. Eighty thousand presented themselves but were hurriedly sent back.

The leudes—from the same root as the German leute, people—consisted of groups of Germans of low origin, who were attached to the Roman armies and established in compact masses on the lands they were commissioned to defend. Others had come in as agriculturists, but on condition of undertaking military service. Many of them became Roman citizens, and some, abandoning their German names, succeeded in reaching the highest rank. The tribes of leudes were settled chiefly along the frontiers, but some were found as far as Noyon, Rheims, Le Mans, Bayeux and Coutance, Clermont in Auvergne and Rennes.

The bodyguard of the Emperors gradually came to be formed largely of barbarians, and especially of Germans. And thus the barbarians came to exercise great influence, and even had a voice in the election of the head of the State. It was German auxiliaries who in the year 360 proclaimed Julian the Apostate Emperor Augustus in Paris. They raised him on a large shield, clashing their bucklers, as was the custom of their country.

The “great invasion” began in 405. The Suevi, the most important of the German nations, headed by Radagaisius, swooped down on Italy, where the famous Stilico inflicted a bloody defeat upon them in front of Florence. But the movement had been unloosed. There were the Burgundians, the Vandals, the Alans (406–407), the latter a Scythian race from the Caucasus. “Nearly all the Alans are handsome, and somewhat fair. Their greatest glory is to kill a man. They make trophies of the skin taken from the heads of the vanquished. They worship in no temple. Their god is a scimitar planted in the ground (Ammianus).”

The Alemanni occupied Alsace. “Numberless tribes,” writes Saint Jerome, “invaded Gaul from the Alps to the Pyrenees, from the Atlantic to the Rhine—Quadi, Vandals, Sarmatians, Alans, Gepidæ, Heruli, Saxons, Burgundians and Alemanni. Mayence was taken and sacked, and thousands of men were massacred in the church. Worms succumbed. Rheims, Amiens, Arras, Thérouanne, Tournai and Strasbourg fell into the hands of the barbarians. Aquitania and the districts of Lyons and Narbonne were ravaged." A devastating flood swept across the fertile fields of Aquitania, crossed the Pyrenees, and spread over Spain.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Franks founded their power on their bonds with the Empire. They seized Cologne and Treves (418). "I have seen the ground heaped up with dead," writes Salvienus, "bodies of both sexes, naked and torn, exposed to the birds and the dogs. The stench of corpses infected the living." "The ravaging of Gaul lasted a long time" (Stilico).

The seat of government was moved back from Treves to Arles.

And now the Franks were masters on both banks of the Rhine from the mouth to the Hercynian Forest. The widows of the best Gallo-Roman families entered the service of the invaders' wives. Under the leadership of Clodion, they pushed as far as the Somme; but at Hesdin-le-Vieux, on the banks of the Canche, Aetius met them and inflicted a severe defeat upon them. Sidonius gives us the details. "On the neighbouring banks of the river, the Franks were celebrating a marriage according to Scythian rites. The maiden was fair as was also the bridegroom. On the chariots were all the preparations for the feast, plates, dishes and cauldrons full of food, the whole decorated with garlands of flowers." Everything, including the bride, fell into the hands of the conquerors (436).

The bonds with Rome were renewed by Aetius, who allowed the Franks to keep their new conquests on condition of swearing fealty to the Empire and providing soldiers. And thus the Franks were settled among the natives in the usual circumstances—a partition of lands and houses. The Franks preferred to leave the walled towns to the Gallo-Romans, and established themselves in the country on the large domains. Numberless villas had been destroyed for generations; these the Franks rebuilt in their own way.

The Burgundians were installed in the basin of the Meuse. They appeared on the Rhine and took up their abode in the region of Worms, where they founded a kingdom celebrated in literary history through the Lay of the Niebelungen, which hymns their great deeds and their misfortunes. Unfortunately the Niebelungenlied has not come down to us in its original shape. In its present form, which seems to date from the thirteenth century, it is no longer even an epic poem, like the Chanson de Roland and the Chanson de Guillaume d'Orange, but a romance of chivalry.

THE MEROVINGIANS

We now lose sight of the Burgundians until the year 435, when Aetius inflicted upon them a crushing defeat in which their King Gunther met with his death. Aetius, in answer to the supplications of the vanquished, made peace with them; but after the year 437, the Huns, led by Attila, appeared and put to the sword all that remained of the Court of the Burgundian Kings and part of the people. This forms the plot of the Niebelungenlied. The Burgundians had already been converted to Arianism.

The Roman Empire welcomed the fugitive nation and allowed it to settle on the banks of the Rhone. They were established there as defenders of the land, as "guests," that is to say, as soldiers.

According to law, the inhabitants were bound to give up to them a third of their houses and slaves, and half their land and woods. The "guests" settled down with their wives and children. Towards the end of the fifth century we find the Burgundians living in this way in Savoy, in Dauphiny, in the basin of the Saône and on the upper reaches of the Loire, at Lyons and in the surrounding district. They seem to have been the least rough of all the German tribes, and the most adaptable to a new form of civilisation. They were workers and liked a sedentary life. Apollonius Sidonius, Bishop and poet, had no complaint to make against these seven-foot giants, except that they greased their hair with rancid butter and exuded an odour of garlic and onions.

The Goths came from the shores of the Baltic and southern Sweden. We know a little more about their feats and achievements, for they had a historian—Jordanes. In the fourth century they spread over the plains of southern Russia and Roumania of the present day, divided into two great nations, the Visigoths or the Goths of the West, and the Ostrogoths or the Goths of the East. Like the Burgundians, they had been converted to the Christian religion in its Arian form.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

About 376, the Visigoths and Ostrogoths were invaded by formidable inundations of Huns, and retired upon the Roman Empire. Theodosius stopped them. After his death (390) Alaric and then his brother-in-law Ataülf (412) resumed their victorious progress. Ataülf overran the south of Gaul and Spain. At Narbonne he married Placida, the daughter of Theodosius, and sister of the two Emperors Arcadius and Honorius. As a wedding present the bridegroom gave his wife the booty taken from her own people in Rome. Ataülf had conceived the ambition of defending the Roman Empire, but he perished at the hands of assassins in 415. He was succeeded by his brother Vallia, to whom Honorius ceded the territory between Toulouse and the Atlantic, together with Bordeaux and certain towns in the neighbouring provinces, under the usual conditions, that is to say, as guests and defenders of the Empire (419). Toulouse became the capital of the new kingdom, which gradually extended its borders, acquiring Narbonne and then Nîmes, and finally crossing the Pyrenees and including a part of Spain.

Like the Visigoths, all these barbarians who settled down in Gaul had promised to serve the Empire faithfully and to use their forces in a friendly fashion for the preservation of the majesty of the Roman people—majestatem populi Romani comiter conservare. Thus they formed encampments throughout Gaul, just like the Roman encampments.

The Gallo-Romans—and this is an important fact—were not the subjects of the new narrivis who had settled in their midst, but continued to be under the jurisdiction of the Empire.

The Burgundians, Goths and Visigoths seem to have lived on friendly terms with the Gallic people. The energetic administration of Julian had only put a stop to the extortion of the imperial officials for a short time. But the Goths and Visigoths were more considerate. “The subjects of the Empire who came under their rule,” writes Salvienus, “desired nothing less than to be forced to return to the rule of Rome.” And certain Gauls together with their families and modest belongings ings even left the districts still under the administration of Rome and came to settle among the Burgundians and the Visigoths, who did not weigh them down beneath such a heavy burden of impositions and taxes.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Thus in the first quarter of the fifth century we find three kingdoms established in Gaul—the Franks north of the Somme, the Burgundians in the basins of the Saône and the upper Loire and in the valley of the Rhone, and the Visigoths in the south, between the Rhone and the Atlantic. The Alemanni had spread over Alsace, the Saxons, a seafaring folk, swarmed along the sea-coast from the Scheldt to the Loire, and finally a Celtic people from Great Britain by continually sending small groups of settlers came to occupy the greater part of the Armorican peninsula.

It must be remembered that the Gallo-Romans were Catholics, the Visigoths and Burgundians Arians and the Franks pagans who worshipped Wotan, Thunder, the Sun, the Earth and the Moon.

As for the Huns, who made their appearance in the second half of the fourth century, they were the most barbarous of the barbarians, a terror even to the latter themselves. They were Tartars. They were an extremely ~~tigress~~ race, with small, tawny, round heads supported on ~~the~~ necks. They wore turned-down caps, cloth tunics and ~~grecian~~ breeches. A contemporary writer compares them to ~~centaurs~~, because they walked with their bodies bent forward "like two-legged animals," due no doubt to their life of ~~hunting~~.

"This people," writes Ammianus, "are of unbounded ferocity. They cover the cheeks of their children with deep wounds in order to prevent them ~~from~~ ~~being~~ ~~seen~~ later on."

According to the same historian, the Huns did not know how to cook or to season their ~~food~~, ~~but~~ ~~lived~~ on raw meat. Their method of ~~cooking~~ ~~meat~~ was in ~~boiling~~ on the meat for a time when they ~~were~~ ~~in~~ ~~battle~~. They ~~were~~ no houses, "but shunned ~~them~~ ~~as~~ ~~if~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~a~~ ~~pestilence".
They used their chariots to ~~live~~ in and these formed the only shelter they had for ~~family~~ ~~life~~ in the combat of military art they knew nothing ~~of~~ ~~but~~ ~~the~~ ~~clash~~ ~~of~~ ~~chariots~~ ~~and~~ ~~horses~~ ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~terrific~~ ~~din~~ ~~and~~ ~~clatter~~, ~~and~~ ~~such~~ ~~noise~~, ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~not~~~~ skilled in shooting arrows with points made of sharp bone. They fought with the sword and the lasso.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

"If you ask one of them whence he comes," says Ammianus, "he can only answer that he was born far away from the place where he was conceived, and brought up yet further away."

Attila, their chief, was a tall, vigorous man, broad-chested and ferocious-looking, with small, very bright eyes which were never still; his beard was sparse and his nose short and flat, and his complexion dark like the rest of his race. He loved war, which he carried on, not only as a fighter, but as a skilled soldier. Gifted with a rare intelligence, he could be trusted to keep his word, to be faithful in friendship and amenable to supplication.

The historian Priscus, who was sent to Attila by Theodosius the Younger, has described his celebrated camp in Pannonia (Hungary). It was a sort of town enclosed by a fence of shining polished wood, the parts of which were joined with such consummate art that the joins could not be seen by the naked eye. Within the enclosure, instead of houses there were numberless tents arranged in orderly fashion. They were all spacious with entrances resembling porticoes. In the centre was the tent of Attila, larger and vaster than the rest, and made of magnificent materials.

It was in 451 that the barbarian hordes crossed the Rhine between Worms and Bingen under the leadership of Attila. On the 6th April Metz was taken and burnt, and the inhabitants massacred. Paris was threatened, and in an agony of fear the Parisii would have deserted their town and sought refuge in the depths of the woods, had they not been calmed and reassured by the voice of a young girl—Saint Geneviève. Geneviève is said to have been a little shepherdess from Nanterre; she may have come from Nanterre, but she was never, any more than Joan of Arc, a shepherdess. Her parents were well-to-do, just as were the parents of Joan of Arc. In the case of Geneviève the mistake was circulated in the seventeenth century owing to the false interpretation of an allegorical engraving, depicting Geneviève praying on the walls of Paris, the inhabitants being represented by sheep, whilst outside the enclosure the Huns were portrayed as wolves. The menace to Paris ended in smoke. Treves was defended by its Bishop Saint Lupus and Orleans by its Bishop Saint Aignan, just as Metz had been by its Bishop Auctor. The power and prestige of the Bishops became consolidated. Aetius hastened up with all the forces he could collect. Franks, Burgundians, Armoricans and Visigoths flocked to join his standards.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Aetius was one of the great figures of the period. From the age of twenty he was to be seen indefatigably barring the road to the barbarians from one end of the Empire to the other. He was born in Mysia (the present Serbia and Bulgaria). In his youth he had lived for some years among the Goths. Alaric, who had become fond of him, trained him in the profession of arms, after which he spent several years with the Huns. And thus he learnt the manners and customs, and the strong and weak side of the barbarians. His administrative and diplomatic gifts equalled his military genius. He conquered one after the other the Visigoths, the Franks, the Burgundians and the Bretons of Armorica. "In him," says Jordanes, "was vested the whole fate of the Empire."

Attila was besieging Orleans and the defence of the town was being directed by Saint Aignan. On the 4th June, 451, Aetius forced the Hun to raise the siege. The decisive battle, the celebrated Battle of the Catalaunian Plains, was fought between Troyes and Châlons-sur-Marne. It was one of the greatest events in European history, the most important in the history of France since the siege of Alesia.

Attila had under his command not only hordes of Huns, but also Ostrogoths, Gepidæ, Thuringians and Alemanni, who followed him as subjects or tributaries. Aetius, on the other hand, had under him Franks—under the command of Meroveus—Visigoths, Burgundians and Saxons, who rendered him obedience as "Roman soldiers."

Blood flowed in such profuse abundance, writes Jordanes, that the stream which watered the plain was transformed into a torrent by it. The soldiers, brought to its banks by thirst, drank blood.

As his army was flinching, Attila retired into his camp, which he had surrounded by the thousands of chariots which followed in the train of the barbarians. Jordanes gives a picture of

THE EARLIEST TIMES

of swearing and fighting. An embryonic industry was the task of slaves, unfortunate wretches whom they had carried off in the course of their "wars" from more civilised peoples.

The most popular branch of this industry was that of the jeweller. Just as the first Romans had chosen the wolf and the Gauls the boar as their sign, so the Franks had taken the bee. On the tomb of Childebert, in Tournai, there are bees carved in gold. Some historians interpret the fleur de lis of the Capets as a development from the wenring down of the Frankish bee. And it is indeed curious that Napoleon I should have replaced the fleur de lis by the bee.

The Franks wore a sort of cloak, half linen and half leather, which came down very low over their bodies, covering half their legs, under which a blouse with narrow sleeves and breeches covered the body closely. They were overloaded with amulets, bracelets and rings. The women wore necklaces made of beads of gold, amber or glass. The men shaved their faces, leaving only the moustache. Their hair, generally fair or red, was gathered up in a tuft on the top of the head. Thus they kept their hair long on the top and short at the back. Only members of the royal family kept the whole of their hair long and allowed it to fall right down their backs as far as the wrist. The slaves had their heads shaved.

Whether they were fair or red-haired, the Franks generally had green eyes.

Their chief weapon was the double-headed axe, with the iron fastened into a handle of ox or horse bone, the famous battle-axe, which they were skilled in hurling to a distance. They also had a kind of javelin shaped like a hooked harpoon. "They hurl this dart at the first onslaught," says Procopius, "and if it happens to be thrown swiftly and enters the body, the spikes stick out through the skin, whilst the handle pulls in the opposite direction, and the wounded man cannot extricate himself from it. Or else they succeed in hooking their harpoon into the enemy's shield and thus depriving him of it."

The horsemen, who were few in number, were armed with a short strong lance, generally made of iron, the end of which was very pointed and also had a double edge.

Procopius gives us a picture of the Franks in their encamp-

THE MEROVINGIANS

ments : " Some were sharpening their battle-axes and their lances, others were setting their darts ; one man was mending what he had broken. They have hardly any armour and do not require any skilled artisan to forge it. They merely have a few smiths who know how to resolder it when it snaps or breaks. The Franks do not wear greaves or breastplates. Most of them fight bare-headed. They do not use bows, or slings, or balistas."

Their houses consisted of huts made of mud or wood, covered with branches or straw, similar to those of the primitive Gauls, but even more rudimentary.

Such was the life of the Franks towards the end of the fifth century, between the Meuse and the North Sea. In the whole of that region there were only two towns—walled encampments—Tournai, where Clovis lived, and Cambrai, where Ragnachar, another Frankish chief, was in command.

The organisation of society was rudimentary—based upon the family which had swelled out into a primitive clan. Each of these small homogeneous groups was under the authority of a chief, and over them, in command of all the bands, was a head chief, whom the writers call " king " for want of a better name. Between the individuals, grouped into families, and this chief, there was no intermediary. The chief had absolute authority and power of life and death.

We have but little information about the lives and actions of the Franks at this period ; we only know that they were plunderers. Treves, among other places, underwent a terrible ordeal. The town was sacked by the Franks, who made no attempt to keep it, or to settle down in it and administer it. They preferred to leave to the industry of the inhabitants the task of amassing a little wealth again, after which they returned and pillaged it a second and third time. Truly " war " was the daily " business " of the Franks.

Clodion seems to have had a son named Meroveus, whom we have seen at the head of his band, under the command of Aetius, in the Catalaunian Plains, and of whom we know nothing beyond the fact that he gave his name to the dynasty. In order to understand how an almost unknown prince could have named a line of kings, we must realise the influence wielded

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This "Count Gilles" was a man of valour. Contemporaries are full of praise for his military virtues. His death, at the beginning of the year 461, was a great grief to the district he ruled. It is not correct to say that his son Syagrius succeeded him. Syagrius never had the title of "Master of the Militia," a title at that time considered far superior to that of king. Syagrius only succeeded his father in the much more restricted functions of governor of the city of Soissons, the word "city" meaning, not only the town, but also the territory of which it was the capital.

Syagrius too seems to have been a man of merit, but he lived in times that became ever more and more troublous. And he did not exercise the great power his father had enjoyed. He knew the Germans so well and spoke their language so correctly that the Franks and Alemanni were on their guard in his presence in case they committed a solecism in their own tongue.

Childeric died when he was still young—about forty—at Tournai. His tomb was discovered in the seventeenth century, and a likeness of him with long hair on a ring. He was buried with his charger and his weapons. The death of Childeric is placed in 481. He was succeeded by his son Clovis.

The Roman Empire of the West had just come to an end in the person of Romulus Augustulus, who was deposed after the capture of Rome by a barbarian chief, Odovnear, prince of the Heruli (476). The last nominal Emperor of the West, Flavienus Julianus Nepos, who took refuge in Dalmatia, was assassinated in that country on the 9th of May, 480, and Gaul opened her arms to a fresh destiny.

Several writers of the period, particularly Salvienus, have depicted the Franks as brave, affable and generous barbarians, though they were lying and treacherous. Procopius, in speaking of them, says, "This nation breaks its faith more easily than any other." And Clovis seems to have been a man of this character, possessed, moreover, of a subtle, crafty and deceitful barbarian intelligence.

Clovis was sixteen when he came to the throne. He naturally began his reign in the district of Tournai, his little Empire. His tender years explain why the first years of his rule passed by without any important undertaking. It is true that his history is difficult to follow. His sole historian, Gregory of Tours, wrote a hundred years after his death, and, in his sim plieity of mind, merely re-echoed the various legends and anecdotes current about the subject of his history. We have already mentioned the poetic traditions of the time, circulated in the form of songs. Many such songs were composed about Clovis and we shall see how the king of the Franks himself contributed to their number. Several historians, Gabriel Monod, W. Junghans, and Godefroy Kurth, believe that Gregory of Tours made use of them and turned them into prose, a theory to which Maurice Prou very rightly objects that "Gregory nowhere makes any reference to these poems." Fustel de Coulanges also observes, "Some modern writers maintain that Gregory must have made use of the Germanic songs in praise of Clovis and the Franks; this is pure hypothesis, without any foundation in fact. Gregory of Tours, who gives his authorities, never mentions them." Nevertheless these songs existed, and in addition there were popular legends and hagiographic tales. Henri Bordier seems to point to the chief source used by Gregory of Tours. When Queen Clotilda became a widow, she retired to Tours, and lived there for thirty-four years close to the sacred basilica. Gregory became Bishop of Tours in 573. He must have collected the tales told by people who had heard them from Saint Clotilda.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Clovis secured the triumph of Catholicism in Gaul, and through Gaul, in the world. The Bishops and the sacred writers who deal with him were filled with immense gratitude to him, and in their sincere enthusiasm they made a travesty of his acts and deeds. The few letters and diplomas which are said to have been written by him are apocryphal as well as the most important texts upon which the history of his reign has been reconstructed. About the civil administration of the Frankish prince we are also in total ignorance.

But this fact has not discouraged his panegyrists, in the front rank of whom must be placed the great historian Godefroy Kurth. "The greater part of the narrative left us by Gregory of Tours," they say, "is legendary or comes from a poetic source." Whereupon they proceed to build up a history of Clovis upon this self-same narrative, discarding as poetical anything that does not suit their purpose and accepting anything which supports their point of view

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Everything that has been written in connection with the marriage of Clovis, the vow of Zulpich, the vase of Soissons, the baptism of the Frankish King and the conversion of his army by Saint Remi—to mention only the most important facts—is merely the embroidery of legend All that remains are the fundamental outlines, the woof upon which the imagination of the sixth century set to work

Clovis united under his rule a large part of Gaul, this much is certain His conquest may be divided into two parts, we are not speaking from the chronological point of view, for the chronology of the history of Clovis is impossible to determine The first part, which Clovis must have had great difficulty in carrying out, was his struggle against the Kinglets of the Franks and Salians in his neighbourhood, for, as we have seen, there was not only a Frankish king at Tournai, but there was also one at Cambrai, another at Thérouanne, and yet another at Dispargum—Dispargum, the mysterious, which seems to have disappeared to day—and in many other places, not to mention the Ripuarians whose capital was at Cologne Gregory of Tours makes all these princes relatives of Clovis All that is certain is that by a series of sudden attacks, murders, ambuscades and perjuries, Clovis succeeded in uniting all these peoples under his own authority In this little epic, dripping with blood, Clovis, at the head of his three thousand companions, hiding in the woods, armed with their axe with its horse bone handle and their famous dagger, the skramiasax, seems a regular bandit chief, greedy of gold and power, to whom all means are good and the quickest are the best Gregory of Tours describes Clovis to the grandson of the hero “When Clovis put to death all the kings who were opposed to him, he had neither gold nor silver”

Gregory exposes this debauchery of crime with quasi religious emotion, as a work of brigandage in which he could see the hand of God It would be impossible to find a more typical example of the way the critical faculty of a good man can be utterly destroyed by a fixed idea The sole matter of importance for Gregory of Tours was to have right ideas about the Holy Trinity, and to believe that the Son had existed from all eternity like the Father; this point once settled, the rest did not matter.

THE MEROVINGIANS

The following dialogue, which the saint himself repeats, lays bare his state of mind. Gregory had entered into a discussion with an Arian, "a man devoid of all capacity for finding ideas," says the Bishop. Agila, the Arian, was having a theological discussion with his opponent, when the latter began all of a sudden to cover him with abuse. The Arian replied :

"Do not blaspheme against a law you do not observe. We for our part, although our belief may not be the same as yours, do not blaspheme against it, because it cannot be regarded as a crime to believe this or that. There is even a proverb among us that if a man passes between the altars of the Gentiles and the church of God, he does no wrong in honouring them both."

These words laid bare to Gregory the "stupidity" of his interlocutor, and saying that he did not wish "to cast his sacred pearls before filthy swine," he abandoned the discussion and left the place.

It must not be imagined that Clovis had from the beginning conceived the vast plan he ultimately realised. He saw that there were territories to be occupied and treasures to be pillaged; but he worked by stages, gradually widening his field of action as his means of execution increased. After having extended his power in the regions about him with all the temerity and wanton spirit of youth, among the Salian Franks themselves, he cast his eyes on the territory which still remained Roman in his own neighbourhood.

Clovis seized the situation quite clearly. In the so-called "kingdom" of Syagrius, the authority of the Roman chief no longer possessed any basis since the disappearance of the Western Empire, and the Gallic population were impatient under the yoke of the Romans. Orosius, writing in the fifth century, says that numbers of Gallo-Romans preferred to go and live among the barbarians a life of poverty but of independence, rather than remain among the Romans as tributary serfs. Salvienus says the same.

Syagrius had only inherited a fragment of his father's authority, and was only obeyed in a very restricted area—the city of Soissons. Moreover, his "kingdom" was riddled with Bagaudæ in revolt against the exactions of the Treasury and against the nobles. Hostile groups of them occupied whole cantons and other rebels were continually swelling their ranks. "Subjects of the Empire," says Salvienus, "they became strangers to it without leaving its territory." It was the Bagaudæ who had opened Gaul to Attila, and they became formidable auxiliaries for Clovis.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The expedition against Syagrius, the Roman King of Soissons, which Junghans places in 486, probably did actually take place between the various slaughters carried out by Clovis in order to secure peaceful possession of his throne and increase his power. The power of the Roman chief had lost its foundation, as indeed had also that of the Burgundian and Visigoth monarchs, for they all enjoyed their position as defenders of the Empire in Gaul. But the kings of the Burgundians and the Visigoths continued to rely on their own subjects, whilst the authority of a man like Syagrius, depending as it did upon his soldiers themselves, was weakened by the disappearance of the Emperor.

Thus the field was opened to Clovis, who was young, intelligent, audacious and utterly devoid of scruple.

As for reasons for attacking his neighbour, he brought none forward—which was just as well. It is better in such wars of plunder not to attempt any sort of justification. They are rendered even more odious if, like Caesar, at the beginning of the Gallic Wars, the aggressor invokes the rights and majesty of the Roman people in order to excuse a wicked attack.

It was quite a small war. Neither side put more than 3000 combatants into the field, and even these figures were doubtless not reached. Syagrius more particularly does not seem to have been able to raise any troops but those belonging to his own domains. One can imagine the young Clovis, leading his band of savage warriors, fair giants, with the backs of their heads shaved, and the hair on the top knotted up into a twisted crest above their foreheads, with their battle axes and their hooked harpoons. "Such an army," says Augustin Thierry, "could not do without brigandage even in a friendly country."

Syagrius was defeated in the neighbourhood of Soissons (486).

THE MEROVINGIANS

and took refuge with Alaric, King of the Visigoths, who ruled at Toulouse. Clovis demanded his surrender, threatening the Visigoths with his victorious army, reinforced by the soldiers of Syagrius who had come over to his side. Alaric was afraid of treachery on the part of the Gallo-Romans, and feared the hostility of the Burgundians. Syagrius was handed over. Clovis had him put to death in the depths of a dungeon "in order to avoid openly provoking his followers," says Godefroy Kurth.

Clovis inherited the whole of the kingdom of the late Roman. The majority of the soldiers who had rendered obedience to Syagrius, thenceforward fought under his command, though keeping their weapons and their ranks. The colours with the device of the bronze wolf mingled with those of the golden bee. "The Roman soldiers and warriors," says Procopius, "who had been left in Gaul for the defence of her frontiers, unable to return to Rome, or surrender themselves to the Burgundians or the Visigoths, who were Arians, ranged themselves on the side of the Franks together with their ensigns, and put into the hands of the Franks the places they were guarding for the Romans, though they kept their own customs, lands, laws and national dress."

Clovis became master of all that constituted the "Treasury," that is to say the coffers and the public lands of the Romans—money and villas. The latter were numerous, and formed the foundation of the wealth which was to be one of the elements of his power.

Clovis transferred his capital from Tournai to Soissons, where he installed himself in what has somewhat pompously been called "the palace of Syagrius." His power extended as far as the Loire. Moreover, nothing was changed in the condition of the Gallo-Romans, who from that time forward had to acknowledge the Frankish king as their chief.

The war against Syagrius was followed by the war which Clovis waged against the Thuringians, or rather against that portion of the Thuringian peoples established at the mouths of the Rhine and the Meuse—Gallic Thuringia. Between the Franks and the Thuringians there existed that feroocious and pitiless rivalry characteristic of hatred between barbarians.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Thierry, the eldest son of Clovis, reminded his brother and his Franks of all this. " You should remember the time when the Thuringians hurled themselves violently upon our fathers, who were suing for peace with them and giving hostages. But the Thuringians killed the hostages, and attacked our fathers, taking away all they possessed, and hanging the children to the trees by the sinews of their thighs. They killed two hundred young girls, whom they bound by their arms and legs to the necks of horses whom they goaded on and forced to tear them in bits; others they stretched out along the roadside bound to stakes, and made heavy chariots drive over them, and after thus breaking their bones, left them still alive a prey to the birds and dogs."

As compared with the Thuringians, Clovis no doubt had a far superior force of men and armaments at his disposal. His hopes of victory were none the less disappointed; his attack failed (491), and the Thuringians preserved their independence.

The marriage of Clovis with Clotilda, the niece of Gondebaud, King of the Burgundians, took place about the year 493. But the exact date is uncertain. Clovis was then twenty-seven or twenty-eight. He was already married and had a son, Thierry, who afterwards succeeded him. We do not know whether he was a widower, or whether he had repudiated his first wife, or whether he still kept her after marrying a second. Clotilda was a Catholic, and had a sister who was a nun. Legend has woven its most brilliant colours about this union which gives the impression of having been a happy one. Clotilda seems to have had a noble nature. Did she impart some of it to her husband? Had she any influence over him? Popular songs and the oldest writers represent her in a somewhat different light from that in which the hagiographers have placed her, and one which brings her closer to her barbarian husband.

It may be asked why the Frankish king consummated this union. Clotilda was a Catholic and Clovis had need of the Bishops. She was the daughter of a Burgundian prince, and Clovis, after making himself master of the Soissons district, had cast his eyes on Burgundy.

It is important to remember the great power of the Catholic Bishops in Gaul in the fifth century, not only from the moral and religious, but also from the social and political point of view. Of all the institutions of the Roman Empire the Church alone remained. The Bishops were the venerated chiefs of the cities, and had far greater power than the municipal magistrates in their decline; they disposed of vast material resources, which were continually swelled by gifts from the faithful; but they were impatient of the suzerainty of the Arian princes in Gaul, the kings of the Burgundians and the Visigoths.

THE MEROVINGIANS

The campaign of Clovis against the Alemanni is generally placed in 496.

The Alemanni were first cousins of the Franks, they had the same marauding customs we have already described, and, at this period, the same beliefs. "They worship certain trees," says Procopius, "and offer them propitiary sacrifices, just as they do in the neighbourhood of the waters of certain rivers, and of certain hills and forests, where with great devotion they immolate horses, oxen and other animals, whose throats they cut." Procopius adds: "I can see nothing pleasing on their little altars, which are covered with the blood of so many animals."

The pretext given seems to have been an attack on the part of the Alemanni against the Ripuarians, whose King, Sigebert, who lived in Cologne, was a relative of Clovis, according to Gregory of Tours. It was in order to avenge this kinsman—whom Clovis later on did not hesitate to assassinate in the most terrible circumstances—that he seems to have gone to war. The army of Clovis consisted of a group of Frankish warriors and Gallo-Roman auxiliaries, that is to say, Roman soldiers engaged to work under his orders. The victory was won by Clovis at some place which it is impossible to identify. It has been located at Tolbiac (the Zülpich of to-day, southwest of Cologne), through the mistake of a sixteenth-century historian, Paul Emile, who confused the battle fought by Clovis against the Alemanni with an earlier battle at Tolbiac fought by Sigebert, King of the Ripuarians of Cologne, against these same Alemanni. It was in consequence of this first battle of Tolbiac that Sigebert, who was wounded in the leg, became lame, which Clovis used as a pretext for having him killed by his son. Some historians, and notably Sybel, have suggested the neighbourhood of Toul as the field of battle. But this is a long way from Tolbiac. As a matter of fact only one thing is certain, and that is that Clovis with his Franks and Romans defeated the Alemanni and subjected their nation to his authority.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This battle, called the battle of Tolbiac, has remained famous on account of the vow of Clovis. Seeing his army wavering, the Frankish King apparently promised the God of Clotilda to worship Him if He gave him the victory. After the eighteenth century, certain French historians, Abbé Legendre and Gaillard, maintained that this "mercenary vow" was not a prayer, but "a bargain that did not deserve to be carried out." We regard the tale as legendary, though it was in keeping with the superstitions of the time.

This was followed by the King's baptism. Here again only one thing is certain, and that is that the young prince was baptised, very probably on Christmas Day, 496, and possibly in the town of Rheims. The certainty of these four facts declines in the order they are mentioned. Some historians are in favour of the town of Tours, and others of Attigny.

A certain number of Franks seem to have been baptised at the same time as their king. "I do not know whether we can place much confidence in their conversion by Saint Remi," says Fustel de Coulanges. At all events it is certain that this conversion was far from including the whole of the Salian Franks, as is proved by the efforts to convert them which were afterwards made by Saint Vaast and other apostles.

Even those of the Franks who were baptised did not bring a very profound faith into their new religion. And in the sixth century we find the northern regions occupied by Franks reverting to paganism. The Bishoprics had disappeared, and fresh missions were required.

Procopius depicts the Franks fighting in Italy under the orders of Thodebert, the grandson of Clovis, still practising their bloody sacrifices, casting horoscopes from the blood of the victims, and obedient to the hints of their sorcerers.

It was in the imagination of the Gauls that the ceremony of baptism made a deep impression.

Saint Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, wrote to Clovis to tell him the joy with which his conversion had filled him. The Catholics, said Saint Avitus, had hitherto been forced to place their faith in eternity, leaving to God the task of deciding whether they or the Arians possessed the true faith. They felt they must leave the decision to the Day of Judgment. But now all was changed. Avitus advised Clovis to spread the doctrines of salvation to the Germanic peoples plunged in the darkness of paganism, and to send them missionaries without delay. For hitherto it was only Arian missionaries who had led the barbarians to the Christian faith.

THE MEROVINGIANS

As for Saint Remi, Archbishop of Rheims, he advised the King to show all deference to the Bishops and to ask their advice on all things.

At this period the throne of Italy was occupied by a magnificent prince, the most brilliant figure of the age—Theodoric the Great, King of the Ostrogoths. He had his capital at Ravenna. We have already seen how he welcomed the fugitive Alemanni and gave them lands to cultivate on his northern frontier, in Rhetia, which, in accordance with the Roman system, he handed over to their care.

The orders he sent to his subjects in the province of Noricum, between the Alps and the Danube, asking them to facilitate the exodus of the fugitive Alemanni, have been preserved. The oxen harnessed to the chariots of the exiles, worn out by the length and difficulty of the road, were to be exchanged for fresh oxen in good condition.

Theodoric wrote Clovis a letter full of the greatest interest, proving the height of power to which, in that disorganised state of society, a band of hardy and unscrupulous ruffians, under the leadership of a young, audacious and intelligent chief, could attain by means of a few cleverly organised attacks. Nothing sheds greater light on the character and attainments of Clovis in the fifth and sixth centuries than the exploits of Robert Guiseard and his brothers in the eleventh century in Italy; frankly brigands, although possessed of a more refined culture than Clovis, they founded splendid kingdoms and acted as protectors of the Papacy.

The letter of Theodoric also contains an astonishing detail to which sufficient attention has not yet been paid, one of the the neighbourhood of Toul as the field of battle. But this is a long way from Tolbiae. As a matter of fact only one thing is certain, and that is that Clovis with his Franks and Romans defeated the Alemanni and subjected their nation to his authority.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This battle, called the battle of Tolbiae, has remained famous on account of the vow of Clovis. Seeing his army wavering, the Frankish King apparently promised the God of Clotilda to worship Him if He gave him the victory. After the eighteenth century, certain French historians, Abbé Legendre and Gaillard, maintained that this "mercenary vow" was not a prayer, but "a bargain that did not deserve to be carried out." We regard the tale as legendary, though it was in keeping with the superstitions of the time.

This was followed by the King's baptism. Here again only one thing is certain, and that is that the young prince was baptised, very probably on Christmas Day, 496, and possibly in the town of Rheims. The certainty of these facts declines in the order they are mentioned. Some historians are in favour of the town of Tours, and others of Attigny.

A certain number of Franks seem to have been baptised at the same time as their king. "I do not know whether we can place much confidence in their conversion by Saint Remi," says Fustel de Coulanges. At all events it is certain that this conversion was far from including the whole of the Salian Franks, as is proved by the efforts to convert them which were afterwards made by Saint Vaast and other apostles.

Even those of the Franks who were baptised did not bring a very profound faith into their new religion. And in the sixth century we find the northern regions occupied by Franks reverting to paganism. The Bishoprics had disappeared, and fresh missions were required.

Procopius depicts the Franks fighting in Italy under the orders of Theodebert, the grandson of Clovis, still practising their bloody sacrifices, casting horoscopes from the blood of the victims, and obedient to the hints of their sorcerers.

It was in the imagination of the Gauls that the ceremony of baptism made a deep impression.

Saint Avitus, Bishop of Vienne, wrote to Clovis to tell him the joy with which his conversion had filled him. The Catholics, said Saint Avitus, had hitherto been forced to place their faith in eternity, leaving to God the task of deciding whether they or the Arians possessed the true faith. They felt they must leave the decision to the Day of Judgment. But now all was changed. Avitus advised Clovis to spread the doctrines of salvation to the Germanic peoples plunged in the darkness of paganism, and to send them missionaries without delay. For hitherto it was only Arian missionaries who had led the barbarians to the Christian faith.

THE MEROVINGIANS

As for Saint Remi, Archbishop of Rheims, he advised the King to show all deference to the Bishops and to ask their advice on all things.

At this period the throne of Italy was occupied by a magnificent prince, the most brilliant figure of the age—Theodoric the Great, King of the Ostrogoths. He had his capital at Ravenna. We have already seen how he welcomed the fugitive Alemanni and gave them lands to cultivate on his northern frontier, in Rhetia, which, in accordance with the Roman system, he handed over to their care.

The orders he sent to his subjects in the province of Noricum, between the Alps and the Danube, asking them to facilitate the exodus of the fugitive Alemanni, have been preserved. The oxen harnessed to the chariots of the exiles, worn out by the length and difficulty of the road, were to be exchanged for fresh oxen in good condition.

Theodoric wrote Clovis a letter full of the greatest interest, proving the height of power to which, in that disorganised state of society, a band of hardy and unscrupulous ruffians, under the leadership of a young, audacious and intelligent chief, could attain by means of a few cleverly organised attacks. Nothing sheds greater light on the character and attainments of Clovis in the fifth and sixth centuries than the exploits of Robert Guiscard and his brothers in the eleventh century in Italy; frankly brigands, although possessed of a more refined culture than Clovis, they founded splendid kingdoms and acted as protectors of the Papacy.

The letter of Theodoric also contains an astonishing detail to which sufficient attention has not yet been paid, one of the tissue of knavish crimes, could have brought the smallest modicum of sincerity into the business. The identity of the three Persons of the Trinity was for him a political and military affair. Moreover, had he any idea of what this theological discussion meant? Henry IV thought Paris well worth a Mass; Clovis thought Gaul well worth his assent to the identity of the Father and the Son, and no neophyte ever affirmed his new faith with greater ardour.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After a series of murders of great number and variety had made Clovis the only Frankish prince in Belgium and Holland, as far as the country of the Frisians and the Saxons in the north, the Thuringians in the east and the Alemanni in the south, after the murder of Chararic and his son, of Ragnochiar, King of Cambrai, and his two brothers, and several other personages, after he had made himself master of the kingdom of Syagrius and of the territory of the Alemanni who had fled to Italy, the young Frankish chief thought he might extend his enterprises even further. "Having exterminated many more kings," writes Gregory of Tours, "and even his nearest kinsmen, Clovis extended his power over the whole of Gaul. Thus he was able to say: 'Woe is me, for I am left like a traveller among strangers and have neither kith nor kin to help me in adversity!'" "He said this out of guile," says Gregory, "in order to find out whether there was anybody left to kill."

In order to understand this passion on the part of Clovis for killing all his relatives, we must remember that the Franks were free to raise on their shields any prince they chose to power, on condition that the man they elected was a member of the royal family, whom they believed was descended from the gods. Thus, according to Gregory of Tours, Clovis imagined that if he killed all the males in his family there would be nobody left to contest his crown.

"Every day," writes our episcopal chronicler, "God made the enemies of Clovis fall in this manner, because the King walked with a pure heart before the Lord and did that which was agreeable unto God."

The Burgundians occupied the basins of the Saône and the Rhone together with Savoy, but did not go down to the

THE MEROVINGIANS

Mediterranean. Avignon was in their hands, but Arles belonged to the Visigoths. On the throne of Vienne (Burgundy) there reigned Gondebaud, the uncle of Clotilda, an interesting figure, a man of letters, speaking Latin and Greek, taking an interest in theology, a wise legislator, carrying on the government by means of Gallo-Roman ministers and in such a way as to be acceptable to their own people. He was a member of the Arian faith, but far from persecuting the Catholics he took counsel with their ministers, and had placed his trust in Saint Avitus, Bishop of Vienne.

Clovis declared war against the Burgundians in the year 500. The Catholic population were favourable towards him as well as a certain party among the Burgundians themselves. Godegisel, Gondebaud's own brother, to whom the Burgundian monarch had confided the administration of part of his kingdom, with Geneva as its capital, betrayed him to the Franks. A battle took place in the neighbourhood of Dijon.

Gregory of Tours gives a charming description of the town of Dijon in the sixth century. It was still nothing more than a "castle with very strong walls," "built in the middle of a fairly smiling plain," says Gregory, "the land of which is so fertile that if the fields are ploughed only once before being sown, they nevertheless produce very rich harvests. The castle is bounded on the south by the River Ouche, which abounds in fish. On the north is another little river, the Suzon, which flows into the castle through one of the gates and out through another, surrounding the ramparts with its calm waters, but before entering the castle it works the mills with astonishing rapidity. Dijon has four gates facing the four points of the compass, and the ramparts are strengthened by thirty-three towers. The wall to a height of twenty feet is built of quarried stone, and its total elevation is thirty feet high by fifteen wide. On the west is a line of fertile hills covered with vines which provide the inhabitants with such a fine Falernian"—it is clear that the good Bishop is a connoisseur—"a wine so good that they despise that which comes from Châlons."

It was in this "fairly smiling" plain that Clovis gave battle to Gondebaud. The struggle continued throughout the day foot by foot, but towards evening Gondebaud saw the victor tissue of knavish crimes, could have brought the smallest modicum of sincerity into the business. The identity of the three Persons of the Trinity was for him a political and military affair. Moreover, had he any idea of what this theological discussion meant? Henry IV thought Paris well worth a Mass; Clovis thought Gaul well worth his assent to the identity of the Father and the Son, and no neophyte ever affirmed his new faith with greater ardour.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After a series of murders of great number and variety had made Clovis the only Frankish prince in Belgium and Holland, as far as the country of the Frisians and the Saxons in the north, the Thuringians in the east and the Alemanni in the south, after the murder of Chararie and his son, of Ragnochar, King of Cambrai, and his two brothers, and several other personages, after he had made himself master of the kingdom of Syagrius and of the territory of the Alemanni who had fled to Italy, the young Frankish chief thought he might extend his enterprises even further. "Having exterminated many more kings," writes Gregory of Tours, "and even his nearest kinsmen, Clovis extended his power over the whole of Gaul. Thus he was able to say: 'Woe is me, for I am left like a traveller among strangers and have neither kith nor kin to help me in adversity!'" "He said this out of guile," says Gregory, "in order to find out whether there was anybody left to kill."

In order to understand this passion on the part of Clovis for killing all his relatives, we must remember that the Franks were free to raise on their shields any prince they chose to power, on condition that the man they elected was a member of the royal family, whom they believed was descended from the gods. Thus, according to Gregory of Tours, Clovis imagined that if he killed all the males in his family there would be nobody left to contest his crown.

"Every day," writes our episcopal chronicler, "God made the enemies of Clovis fall in this manner, because the King walked with a pure heart before the Lord and did that which was agreeable unto God."

The Burgundians occupied the basins of the Saône and the Rhone together with Savoy, but did not go down to the tissue of knavish crimes, could have brought the smallest modicum of sincerity into the business. The identity of the three Persons of the Trinity was for him a political and military affair. Moreover, had he any idea of what this theological discussion meant? Henry IV thought Paris well worth a Mass; Clovis thought Gaul well worth his assent to the identity of the Father and the Son, and no neophyte ever affirmed his new faith with greater ardour.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After a series of murders of great number and variety had made Clovis the only Frankish prince in Belgium and Holland, as far as the country of the Frisians and the Saxons in the north, the Thuringians in the east and the Alemanni in the south, after the murder of Chararic and his son, of Ragnochar, King of Cambrai, and his two brothers, and several other personages, after he had made himself master of the kingdom of Syagrius and of the territory of the Alemanni who had fled to Italy, the young Frankish chief thought he might extend his enterprises even further. "Having exterminated many more kings," writes Gregory of Tours, "and even his nearest kinsmen, Clovis extended his power over the whole of Gaul. Thus he was able to say: 'Woe is me, for I am left like a traveller among strangers and have neither kith nor kin to help me in adversity!'" "He said this out of guile," says Gregory, "in order to find out whether there was anybody left to kill."

In order to understand this passion on the part of Clovis for killing all his relatives, we must remember that the Franks were free to raise on their shields any prince they chose to power, on condition that the man they elected was a member of the royal family, whom they believed was descended from the gods. Thus, according to Gregory of Tours, Clovis imagined that if he killed all the males in his family there would be nobody left to contest his crown.

"Every day," writes our episcopal chronicler, "God made the enemies of Clovis fall in this manner, because the King walked with a pure heart before the Lord and did that which was agreeable unto God."

The Burgundians occupied the basins of the Saône and the Rhone together with Savoy, but did not go down to the

THE MEROVINGIANS

Mediterranean. Avignon was in their hands, but Arles belonged to the Visigoths. On the throne of Vienne (Burgundy) there reigned Gondebaud, the uncle of Clotilda, an interesting figure, a man of letters, speaking Latin and Greek, taking an interest in theology, a wise legislator, carrying on the government by means of Gallo-Roman ministers and in such a way as to be acceptable to their own people. He was a member of the Arian faith, but far from persecuting the Catholics he took counsel with their ministers, and had placed his trust in Saint Avitus, Bishop of Vienne.

Clovis declared war against the Burgundians in the year 500. The Catholic population were favourable towards him as well as a certain party among the Burgundians themselves. Godegisel, Gondebaud's own brother, to whom the Burgundian monarch had confided the administration of part of his kingdom, with Geneva as its capital, betrayed him to the Franks. A battle took place in the neighbourhood of Dijon.

Gregory of Tours gives a charming description of the town of Dijon in the sixth century. It was still nothing more than a "castle with very strong walls," "built in the middle of a fairly smiling plain," says Gregory, "the land of which is so fertile that if the fields are ploughed only once before being sown, they nevertheless produce very rich harvests. The castle is bounded on the south by the River Ouche, which abounds in fish. On the north is another little river, the Suzon, which flows into the castle through one of the gates and out through another, surrounding the ramparts with its calm waters, but before entering the castle it works the mills with astonishing rapidity. Dijon has four gates facing the four points of the compass, and the ramparts are strengthened by thirty-three towers. The wall to a height of twenty feet is built of quarried stone, and its total elevation is thirty feet high by fifteen wide. On the west is a line of fertile hills covered with vines which provide the inhabitants with such a fine Falernian"—it is clear that the good Bishop is a connoisseur—"a wine so good that they despise that which comes from Châlons."

It was in this "fairly smiling" plain that Clovis gave battle to Gondebaud. The struggle continued throughout the day, foot by foot, but towards evening Gondebaud saw the victory tissue of knavish crimes, could have brought the smallest modicum of sincerity into the business. The identity of the three Persons of the Trinity was for him a political and military affair. Moreover, had he any idea of what this theological discussion meant? Henry IV thought Paris well worth o Mass; Clovis thought Goul well worth his assent to the identity of the Father and the Son, ond no neophyte ever affirmed his new faith with greater ardour.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After a series of murders of great number and variety had made Clovis the only Frankish prince in Belgium and Holland, as far as the country of the Frisians and the Saxons in the north, the Thuringians in the east and the Alemanni in the south, after the murder of Chararie and his son, of Ragnochar, King of Cambrai, and his two brothers, ond several other personages, after he had mode himself master of the kingdom of Syogrius and of the territory of the Alemanni who had fled to Italy, the young Frankish chief thought he might extend his enterprises even further. "Having exterminated many more kings," writes Gregory of Tours, "ond even his nearest kinsmen, Clovis extended his power over the whole of Gaul. Thus he was oble to say: 'Woe is me, for I am left like a traveller among strangers and have neither kith nor kin to help me in adversity!'" "He said this ont of guile," says Gregory, "in order to find out whether there was anybody left to kill."

In order to understand this passion on the part of Clovis for killing all his relatives, we must remember that the Franks were free to raise on their shields any prince they chose to power, on condition that the man they elected was a member of the royal family, whoni they believed was descended from the gods. Thus, according to Gregory of Tours, Clovis imagined that if he killed all the males in his family there would be nobody left to contest his crown.

"Every day," writes our episcopal chronicler, "God made the enemies of Clovis fall in this manner, because the King walked with n pure heart before the Lord and did that which was agreeable unto God."

The Burgundians occupied the basins of the Saône and the Rhone together with Savoy, but did not go down to the

THE MEROVINGIANS

Mediterranean. Avignon was in their hands, but Arles belonged to the Visigoths. On the throne of Vienne (Burgundy) there reigned Gondebaud, the uncle of Clotilda, an interesting figure, a man of letters, speaking Latin and Greek, taking an interest in theology, a wise legislator, carrying on the government by means of Gallo-Roman ministers and in such a way as to be acceptable to their own people. He was a member of the Arian faith, but far from persecuting the Catholics he took counsel with their ministers, and had placed his trust in Saint Avitus, Bishop of Vienne.

Clovis declared war against the Burgundians in the year 500. The Catholic population were favourable towards him as well as a certain party among the Burgundians themselves. Godegisel, Gondebaud's own brother, to whom the Burgundian monarch had confided the administration of part of his kingdom, with Geneva as its capital, betrayed him to the Franks. A battle took place in the neighbourhood of Dijon.

Gregory of Tours gives a charming description of the town of Dijon in the sixth century. It was still nothing more than a "castle with very strong walls," "built in the middle of a fairly smiling plain," says Gregory, "the land of which is so fertile that if the fields are ploughed only once before being sown, they nevertheless produce very rich harvests. The castle is bounded on the south by the River Ouche, which abounds in fish. On the north is another little river, the Suzon, which flows into the castle through one of the gates and out through another, surrounding the ramparts with its calm waters, but before entering the castle it works the mills with astonishing rapidity. Dijon has four gates facing the four points of the compass, and the ramparts are strengthened by thirty-three towers. The wall to a height of twenty feet is built of quarried stone, and its total elevation is thirty feet high by fifteen wide. On the west is a line of fertile hills covered with vines which provide the inhabitants with such a fine Falernian"—it is clear that the good Bishop is a connoisseur—"a wine so good that they despise that which comes from Châlons."

It was in this "fairly smiling" plain that Clovis gave battle to Gondebaud. The struggle continued throughout the day, foot by foot, but towards evening Gondebaud saw the victory

THE EARLIEST TIMES

tants. The Arians are the Protestants of the fourth and fifth centuries, and, for the reason we have just adduced, they were destined, like the Protestants of the Reformation, to become divided up into a certain number of sects. At all events the Arian who had a controversy with Gregory of Tours was right when he told him that it ill became him to despise anyone because in all good faith he held such and such a belief, above all when this belief was, like Arianism, closely akin to Catholicism, and full of beauty, idealism and devotion.

Theodoric the Great, aware of the intentions of the Frankish king, and of the alliances he had formed for the realisation of the infamous blow he was preparing, made up his mind to intervene. It is a poignant episode. In the darkness of the reign of Clovis it forms a ray of light shed by contemporary documents; in that rough and sinister fifth century it surrounds with a halo of glory a barbarian prince trying to play a part which in the twentieth century we should like to see filled by the League of Nations.

"Beware of those who derive satisfaction from a conflict in which they take no share, and pray God that such an iniquity shall not influence your decision. I beg you to believe," writes Theodoric to Clovis, "that he who would precipitate another into ways of violence does not give him good counsel."

These letters are admirable. The following is an abbreviated translation.

First of all Theodoric wrote to Clovis as follows.

"Heaven has ordained that kings should be brought into touch with each other by the ties of kinship"—Theodoric was the brother-in-law of Clovis and the father-in-law of Alaric—"so that their tranquil souls may give the peoples the peace they desire. This is a sacred thing and should be upset by no act of violence. In what pledges can we have faith if we repudiate sentiment? Wherefore we are the more surprised that for trivial reasons you are preparing to engage in the direst conflict with King Alaric, so that those who fear you are filled with joy by your disagreement. In the flower of your strength you are both of you rulers of two great peoples. With what a terrible upheaval will you afflict your kingdoms if you allow the two factions (Arians and Catholics) to enter into a clash of arms undisturbed. May your valour not unexpectedly become a cause of calamity for your country!—for the kings a petty quarrel but for the people a terrible misfortune. Freely and affectionately will I say what I think. Such is the impetuosity of man's temper that it drives you to flourish your weapons at the first word. But that which we wish to obtain let us, on the contrary, await as the award of arbitration. Let the conflict die down, cast away your arms. I am an old man, and I speak to you as a father and a friend. And remember this much, that he who rejects our advice will have us and our allies against him. We are sending you two ambassadors, and also to King Alaric. May no malicious hand place snares between you! Keep the peace and silence your differences through the voice of friends who will act as intermediaries. To these friends we are also addressing ourselves, so that the peoples, after having enjoyed a long peace, may not be overcome by a sudden disaster. Lend an ear to the counsels of one whom you have always seen smile upon any good fortune that has befallen you. He who tries to precipitate his neighbour into violent conflicts is certainly no trusty counsellor."

THE MEROVINGIANS

After this Theodoric addressed himself to the King of the Visigoths in no less emphatic terms :

"Although you have a multitude of kinsmen to strengthen your courage, although you have not forgotten that the might of Attila gave way beneath the hand of the Visigoths, remember that the bravest of peoples, like your own, grow soft during long years of peace; wherefore take care not to expose to the hazard of war those who for so long have lost the practice of arms. Do not abandon yourself to blind rage. How much wisdom is there in moderation, the guardian angel of the nation! It is desirable to rush to arms only when justice demands it, even the smallest crevice in which to lurk on the enemy. Wait until our ambassadors have reached the king of the Franks, so that common friends may settle your dispute by arbitration. Does the murder of a kinsman of the Franks in your territory offend you? Your quarrel is now a matter of words. A settlement will be easy if you do according to us. Disregarding all family bonds, we and our allies will oppose with picked troops and justice, the crew of dogs, the vilifirst breaks the peace. Do not allow yourself to be influenced by those who take malicious joy in conflicts arising between their neighbours. May Heaven keep you from such iniquity. Any evil that may befall you finds in us an adversary as well as those who wish you harm."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Theodoric had been informed of the offensive alliance which was being made between Clovis and Gondeboud, King of the Burgundians. He wrote in emphatic terms to the latter:

"It would be a great wrong to plan without warning an immediate conflict between two kings who are dear to me. I could not suffer it that princes, who are bound to me by family ties, should fight against one another. You all of you have in your hands the pledges of my good will. . . . It is my part, with words of reason, to curb the passions of two young kings. In the effervescence of their youth they owe respect to age. I am obliged to speak roughly for fear lest my neighbours go to extremes. With this object I am sending my legates to my son [son-in-law] Alaric so that he may see—before I march out against the King of the Franks with my allies—whether the quarrel cannot be reasonably settled through friendly mediation. No man can doubt that the outbreak of war would cause me the greatest displeasure. The bearers of these letters will make other communications to you by word of mouth. I trust that your prudence will order all for the best, as usual, with the help of God."

These missives were completed by a last letter addressed by Theodoric, as a sort of circular, to the Kings of the Thuringians, the Warnians and the Herulians. The Thuringians were neighbours of the Franks between the Elbe and the Saale; the Warnians were a Germanic people of the north, between the Elbe and the Oder as far as the Baltic; the Herulians were Germanic tribes some of whom were established in Italy. Sidomus speaks of them as follows: "The Herulians, whose cheeks are daubed with blue and whose complexions are of the sanguine colour as the sea the most distant shores of which they inhabit."

Theodoric saw quite clearly through the ambition of Clovis. "Arrogance, which is hated of God, should be banned by every accord. He who would bring trouble upon a nation by a premeditated crime will not spare others. The greatest of crimes is the contempt of right and truth. The man who has overcome one great adversary in hateful combat will think he should overcome all. [The war against Alaric and his family are clearly foreseen.] Wherefore I beseech you, who are conscious of your own valour and are doubtless irritated by hateful presumption, to send your ambassadors together with mine to my brother Gondevaud [King of the Burgundians] and to Clovis, King of the Franks, in order that they may abstain from attacking the Visigoths out of respect for justice, and set forth to discover the right of nations, or else let him who despises our offer of arbitration await our combined attack. I will say what I think without circumlocution. He who would act in violation of all equity is preparing to destroy the kingdoms of all of us. Remember the friendship shown you by the aged Euric [King of the Visigoths, and father of Alaric], the help he gave you, the number of wars with which your neighbours threatened you that he warded off. Show your gratitude to his son. If a kingdom like his falls, you will be attacked in your turn. I charge two ambassadors with verbal messages so that, with the help of God, we may act in common accord. Do not hesitate to spread your valour beyond your frontiers, for fear lest you may soon have to fight on your own ground."

THE MEROVINGIANS

In writing this last letter, Theodoric had only the faintest hope that peace would be maintained.

The treasures of Alaric shone with too seductive a brilliance. Clovis knew that the Burgundians would take the Visigoths on the flank, whilst he himself would make a frontal attack; he knew that the menaces of the Byzantine fleet would prevent Theodoric from taking action, and he knew that in Aquitania he would be supported by a considerable section of the people headed by their Bishops. And, indeed, several of the latter had to be expelled by Alaric, who convicted them of being in touch with the Frankish King.

Clovis left Paris, where he had taken up residence, and marched on Poitiers (507). Alaric had made a desperate appeal to all his subjects. As Theodoric had reminded them, the Visigoths had lived in peace for a long time, and they naturally found themselves at a disadvantage with the Frankish warriors.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

They were attacked in the rear by the Burgundians. The Catholics were making terms with the invader, for on crossing the Loire Clovis published a declaration reassuring members of the Catholic clergy, the attendants in the churches, widows and orphans and all who owed allegiance to the Gallo-Roman clergy.

The decisive battle was fought at Vouillé in the deep valley of the Auxance. Alaric was beaten and fell in the fight, it is said at the hand of Clovis himself, who seized his treasures and his lands, as he had seized the Roman coffers after his victory over Syagrius. Once again massacres took place. The slaughter was terrible and recalled the butcheries of Caesar.

Countless numbers of Visigoths, reduced to slavery, were taken out of the country in chains. Even the "peace" promised to members of the Church was not respected. Numbers of nuns were reduced to slavery.

Auvergne alone still held out. The admirable people of these parts, who had fought against Caesar with the energy we have already described, opposed the Frankish hordes with equal loyalty of heart. To bring them to submission a special campaign, under the leadership of Thierry, or Theodoric, the eldest son of Clovis, was necessary.

It is maintained that in 508 no Arians survived in Aquitania; they had been completely annihilated.

The power of Clovis extended thenceforward to the Pyrenees.

On his way home the leader of the troops stopped at Tours to make handsome offerings in the basilica of Saint Martin. The treasures of Alaric provided him with the means. In this connection an anecdote is told, the first repartee attributed in the annals of France to a head of the State. On reaching the tomb of St. Martin to return thanks for his victory, the Frankish warrior, as was customary, gave his horse as a gift to the church, though reserving to himself the right of buying it back again. He offered a hundred gold pieces for it, but the animal reared and refused to come out of the stable. He was obliged to double the sum.

"Assuredly," said Clovis, "Saint Martin is a mighty friend help, but he drives a mighty hard bargain."

These were high achievements which were followed by a less glorious sequence of events for the conqueror. In return for their able help the Burgundians were to have been given Provence. The Greeks, who were allies of Clovis, had just disembarked in Apulia from a fleet of two hundred vessels, and were spreading fire and slaughter everywhere. Theodoric divided his forces, and sent one half against the Greeks and the other to Provence. Arles was being besieged by the armies of both the Franks and the Burgundians. The inhabitants were holding out, and the Franks and Burgundians redoubled their efforts. The towers and the walls of the ramparts were crumbling away; still the people of Arles held out, when the generals of Theodoric arrived upon the scene. One was called Tulum and the other Ibbas. Saint Cæsarius, Bishop of Arles, had won a great reputation in the besieged town on account of his charity towards the infidels, doubtless the Arian Burgundians, whom the Arlesians had taken prisoner on their sorties, and whom they had herded together in their basilica. It must be remembered that Clovis, who had made war on the Visigoths because it really distressed him too much to see this fair kingdom in the hands of Arians and heretics, did not hesitate, in order to secure the success of his enterprise, to enter into alliance with the Burgundians, who were no less Arians and heretics. Saint Cæsarius visited the prisoners and gave them food and clothes, and ransomed as many as he could according to his means—a beautiful and inspiring example of which the Catholic clergy in Gaul provided many an instance.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Theodoric's generals fell upon the Franks and Burgundians who were besieging Arles, like cats fall upon a group of sparrows. Arles was relieved.

Theodoric hastened to write the victorious Arlesians the following charming letter (winter of 508–509) :

“ Although the most urgent duty is to come to the help of the inhabitants and to show proof of interest more particularly towards men, we think we ought to divide our gifts between the citizens and the ramparts which should be put back into repair. May the prosperity of the town, combined with that of its citizens, be recovered through the good order of your buildings. We are sending you funds for the repair of the walls of Arles and her ancient towers, and we are preparing victuals which will lighten your expenses They will arrive as soon as the weather becomes propitious for navigation Courage! Have faith in our promises and confidence in the good will of God, for our words are as well stocked with benevolence as the shops are with food "

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Thus Theodoric saved for the Visigoths the districts of Narbonne, Carcassonne, Beziers and Nimes, which became Septimania He kept Provence, including Orange, Avignon, Arles and Marseilles, thus securing the communication of his own country with Spain In the organisation of his conquests he displayed all the intelligence that history has associated with his name In their manner of life the inhabitants found that nothing was changed except the name of their king Their ancient privileges were preserved An Arian prince, Theodoric nevertheless had restored to the Catholic church of Narbonne all that she had lost He took a pride in alleviating suffering, and forestalling the wishes of his subjects even before they were expressed

"Under a benevolent prince," he writes, "there should be no need to clamour for remedies long delayed, goodness should not wait to be asked Vows shine with a sweeter brilliance when they are made after the prayer has been fulfilled" And again

"Justice is only perfect when it discovers the oppressed before being drawn towards them by the hands of supplicants"

But to return to Clovis, from whom we have wandered far On all these events, on the defeat of the Franks before Arles, Gregory of Tours preserves a pious silence His hero did not shine here in a brilliant light

As a reward for having conquered the Visigoths, and having thus ruined the policy of Theodoric in Gaul, Anastasius, the Emperor of the East, honoured Clovis with the title of patrician thus making him the lieutenant of the imperial crown beyond the Alps, a title of honour to which he soon added that of consul, the greatest privilege which could be conferred at that time by the heir of Caesar and Augustus The inaugural ceremony was carried out at Tours, on the 1st of January, 509, with the greatest solemnity. The clergy enhanced the beauty of the proceedings with their most gorgeous ceremonies Clad in the consular

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The way in which the founder of the Frankish monarchy in Gaul consolidated his "conquests," however, had important consequences. It has been a matter of surprise that Clovis and his Franks should have left the Gallo-Romans in possession of their lands. But this is easily explained. Clovis owed the greater part of his successes to the inhabitants of the "conquered" districts themselves, who were favourably disposed towards him. After the victory, the Frankish chieftain seized the domains of the Roman Treasury and the treasure of Alarie: that was all he could do. And even so he had more than he needed for rewarding his companions in arms, especially as they were fine fellows who were much better adapted for pillaging villas and estates than administering them.

If he had despoiled them Clovis would have set against him the territorial aristocracy, who would have turned him and all his band out of the country. So naturally the Gallo-Romans were not dispossessed of their property. The Franks did not act from generosity; respect for landed property was a necessity in their case.

Benjamin Guérard also points out that Clovis and his successors never reigned over the territories of Gaul, nor even over the people who inhabited them, but only over the armed bands that scoured the country and gave themselves over to plunder without distinguishing between friend and foe. Neither Clovis nor his successors ever carried on any sort of administrative system.

The King of the Franks died in his bed, still young, in his forty-fifth year, after a life well filled with murder. He killed with his own hands, or had killed through his intrigues, at least ten kings or sons of kings—Syagrius, put to death in his dungeon; Alarie and the King of the Alemanni—the two latter at least killed in the din of battle; then there were Sigebert, King of Cologne, and his son Cloderic, Chiareric, King of the Morini, and his son, the King of Cambrai, Ragnaehar, and his brother Richa, the King of Le Mans and his brother, all murdered by Clovis or by his orders, the father sometimes being killed by the son.

And the sinister line of kings of which he was the founder will display before our eyes a group of criminals beside whom the creations of Shakespeare will appear as models of moral worth and virtue.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Benjamin Guérard, the historian who knows this period best, writes in his immortal Prolegomènes: "Under the first race, there was consistent progress only towards barbarism." Such too was the opinion of Guizot and of Fustel de Coulanges, and we may perhaps be allowed to subscribe to the verdict of the three greatest historians of the nineteenth century.

Clovis had four sons—Thierry, or Theodorie, the offspring of his first marriage, and Clodomir, Childebert and Clotar, born from Sons and Grandsons of Clovis. His union with Clotilda. He also left a daughter named Clotilda after her mother, who married Amalarie, the son of Alarie, King of the Visigoths, the alliance proving most unhappy owing to their religious differences. Clotilda, the daughter of Saint Clotilda, was an ardent Catholic, whilst Amalaric, whose father had been killed by his wife's father, and he himself dispossessed of his lands because he was an Arian, had on that account remained all the more deeply attached to his beliefs.

The four sons divided the kingdom between them. The eldest, Thierry, or Theodoric, received the eastern portion with Rheims as its capital; it included the towns of Cologne, Treves, Strasbourg, Metz, Toul and Verdun. He had, moreover, part of Aquitaine, including Auvergne, Velay, Quercy and the Limousin.

Clodomir had included in his share the districts of Orleans and Chartres, Anjou, La Touraine, Le Berry and Poitou.

Childebert, the third son, had the north-western portion, with Paris as capital. Amiens, Rouen, Beauvais, Coutances and Le Mans were included in his lot. Lastly, the fourth son, Clotar, received the Soissons district, together with Laon, Noyon, Cambrai, Tournai and, towards the north, the whole country as far as the Meuse.

Theodoric, or Thierry, the eldest, was twenty-five at the time of his father's death. The four brothers were associated together in the government, or rather the exploitation, of their States. They placed their capitals on the extreme edge of their territories so as to keep in communication with each other—Rheims, Orleans, Paris and Soissons.

Like their father, Theodorie, Clodomir, Childebert and on his knees, Childebert intervening on his behalf, Clotar thrusting his brother back and killing the younger as he had done the elder. The last of the sons of Clodomir—Clodvold abbreviated into “Cloud”—was hidden in a small place in the neighbourhood of Paris. He devoted himself to the worship of God, and future generations made him a saint and gave his name to the village which had provided him with shelter—“Saint Cloud.” Clotar, infuriated that one of his victims should have escaped him, at least gave himself the pleasure of massacring all the staff which had been attached to the young prince.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Childebert, King of Paris, who had tried to save his nephew from death, was the most civilised of the three brothers, and preferred peace and tranquillity to the bloody game of war. If we may believe Gregory, he loved letters and justice. “He was the first of our kings,” writes the Bishop of Tours, “who knew Latin, whilst his father and grandfather (Clovis and Childeric) only spoke ‘Sicambrian.’” By Latin must be understood the popular “Roman” language in process of developing into French.

As for Clotar, the last of the sons of Clovis and Clotilda, he was the monster of the family, of that family so fertile in the production of monsters. We have just seen the virtuosity with which he set to work to kill children. His son Chramnus rebelled against him, and then took refuge with Chonobet, a Breton King. Clotar followed him, killed Chonobet and shut up his son Chramnus together with his wife and children in a cottage to which he set fire. He refused to leave the place until the flames had consumed the building and all it contained. “Chramnus,” he said, with the deepest emotion, “is of all my children the one I loved best,” and he compared himself to King David chastising his son Absalom for rebellion.

Clotar was married six times. He had several legitimate wives at the same time as well as various additional conjugal helpers. Montesquieu is of opinion that these marriages were less a proof of incontinence than “an attribute of dignity.” As Clotar extended his sway over the whole of Gaul, and an Empire far wider than that of Clovis himself, his dignity was very great.

THE MEROVINGIANS

On the death of his brother Clodomir, Clotar, as we have already seen, murdered his children, and married his widow. On the death of his nephew Theodebald, Clotar married his widow in the same way—Valrada, daughter of the King of the Lombards. He felt himself bound to marry all the widows in his family. He was very fond of Ingonda, whom he had also married. She sent for her sister Aregonda to Court, and begged Clotar to find a husband for her. Clotar inspected Aregonda and found her charming; “I have seen your sister,” he told his wife, “and I have given her for husband the greatest noble in my Court.”

Thus Clotar had the two sisters as wives each in turn.

He lived on his estates, on the great farms, going from one to the other, from Braine to Attigny, from Attigny to Compiègne, and from Compiègne to Verberie, he and his suite consuming the produce and the revenues, hunting and fishing with his retainers and from time to time choosing out some pretty girl from the homes of his dependants, the administrators, cultivators, serfs and slaves on his domains.

On the huge farms which somewhat resembled the great agricultural establishments of modern France, the Merovingian kings were far happier than in the more elegant Gallo-Roman villas. These farms were large rustic dwellings of a non-military nature. They were entered by means of porticoes, either in the antique style or in carved wood. About the chief building occupied by the sovereign were the houses of the heads of companies who had attached themselves to him together with their men by bonds of fealty. Then came a whole scattered village in which lived, not only the labourers on the estate and their families, but also the artisans required by the royal Court and its retinue—wheelwrights, carpenters, curriers, ironmongers, weavers, armourers, as well as goldsmiths. There were also women’s workrooms for dyeing cloth, and sewing and embroidering.

In large covered enclosures the synods of the Bishops were convoked, or other assemblies which used to be terminated by banquets worthy of Pantagruel, at which whole boars, roasted on iron spits, were placed on the tables.

When the produce of one of these large farms, which had been

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Belisarius had inflicted a defeat upon them. They advanced in all confidence, with demonstrations of friendship, to meet the Franks, their allies, whom they were impatiently awaiting. But the latter set to work incontinently to kill them as they had already killed the Ostrogoths. The Romans in their turn fled in terror, leaving to the Franks their camp full of provisions.

Belisarius wrote to the King of the Franks.—

"I do not believe, Theodebert, that it befits a decent man, though he be a prince and chief of so great a number of soldiers, to make use of lying and deceit. Moreover, it is a villainy, of the vilest and most abject in the world, to break an oath given in writing and to disregard agreements entered into. After having promised to undertake this war against the Goths, you come and attack us. . . ."

Theodebert beat a retreat before Belisarius, just as Clovis had done before Theodoric; but it was only to return to the charge, and to profit by the constant struggle, complicated by religious dissensions, of Catholics against Arians, and Rouans against Ostrogoths. Numbers of Franks and Alemanni swept down upon Italy in his train. When he returned to Gaul Theodebert left them under the command of a lieutenant named Bushn or Bultin, who sent to him from Italy quantities of treasure which he won by pillage. Thanks to these fresh resources, Theodebert raised a considerable army which he recruited with Lombards and Gepidae in addition to Franks and Alemanni. His object was to march through Thrace against Constantinople, and to place the imperial crown upon his own brow. Thus the Roman Empire would have been revived in the sixth century with a grandeur that Charlemagne himself did not succeed in endowing it with. But a premature death put an end to these fair schemes.

Theodebert died at the age of forty-three through an accident in the hunting field (547).

The Franks whom he had let loose in Italy were constantly receiving fresh recruits, who were only too pleased to come to pillage those fertile districts. They continued to fight, plunder and shed blood in their customary fashion until the year 553, when, in the neighbourhood of Castinum, on the Volturnus, in Campania, they were surrounded and massacred in one of the most terrible battles of history by the Romans under the command of the Persian General Narses.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Theodebert, writes Gregory of Tours, proved himself great and full of goodness. He governed with equity, showed respect for the Bishops and enriched the churches. He spread his benefits with a generous hand, and lived in the odour of gentleness and piety.

Theodebert had been very much in love with a young widow named Deutheria. She was, says Gregory of Tours, a lady of rare merit and great prudence. A signal instance of this prudence is shown in the following tale, also recorded by Gregory of Tours. Deutheria had a daughter who was fairly tall and exceedingly pretty. For fear lest she should please the King, her mother had her put in a chariot harnessed to two wild bulls and hurled from the top of a bridge into the Meuse.

Theodebert's heir was Theodebalt—or rather Thibault, as the old French historians call him—a young man feeble in mind and body. He became King in 538 at the age of fourteen, and died in 555.

Left sole master of Gaul, except Septimania, Clotar, the last son of Clovis, governed it in his own way, as a medioere monarch, heavy-handed and devoid of any aim or political idea. In that great Empire he looked for nothing but the satisfaction of his primitive and brutal vanity, the possession of resplendent treasures and the satisfaction of gross appetites. In 556 he headed an expedition against the Saxons and suffered a severe defeat.

On his death at Compiègne in 561, he left four sons, Caribert, Gontram, Sigebert and Chilperic. Once more a division of property took place, first in 561, and again in 567, one of the brothers, Caribert, having died without issue.

The figure of Caribert remains a mystery, Fortunatus having nothing but good to say of him and Gregory of Tours nothing but evil. Caribert prided himself on his literary tastes and on being able to speak Latin correctly.

To describe these partitions, with their divisions and subdivisions, in detail, would be wearisome; one point only in the partition of 567 is interesting, and that is the importance already acquired by the town of Paris, which was so large that the three brothers decided to leave it undivided, none of them having the right to enter it without the consent of the others.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The partition was, moreover, extremely complicated, the principal towns in the same region being frequently divided between the three brothers. Roughly speaking, Sigebert received north eastern France, which was soon afterwards called Austrasia, the Kingdom of the East—the word from which the “Austria” of to-day is derived—together with Auvergne and the districts of Velay, Vivarais, and Albi; Chilperic received north-western France, Neustria, which meant “the newes Kingdom,” Neuester reich, the Franks having established themselves in it later than in Austrasia, together with the district of Limousin, Quercy, Bordeaux, Auch, Bigorre and Comminges finally Gontram had Champagne, Burgundy, and the district of Berry, Lyons, Dauphiny and Savoy and, in addition, Saintonge, Angoumois and Périgord. These divisions are only given roughly, each of the three princes having insisted on receiving slices of land in his brothers’ domains.

The chief reason for this division was that the northern regions endowed the owner with power, on account of the leudes and dependants, and the southern regions provided red and white wine, which had assumed a vast importance in the eyes of the Franks and other barbarians, who had become insatiable tipplers ever since the divine juice of the grape had made them despise the fermented barley on which their ancestors had become drunk.

After the death of Caribert, Clotar’s eldest surviving son was Gontram, who had received Burgundy as his portion. He was a singular mentality, a mixture of sweetness and violence, furious outbursts of rage disordering an otherwise almost ecclesiastical tenure. For the sake of a hunting horn he would have several of his men tortured. He would kill one of his leudes for having hunted a bison on his lands. He prided himself on being a lover of justice and allowing himself to be guided by the wisdom of the Bible. A benefactor of the Church and of religious foundations. He imagined he could thus atone for his numberless crimes, as the chroniclers of the day, who all belonged to the Church, laid great stress on this. “He was full of goodness,” says Fredegar.

THE MEROVINGIANS

"and in an assembly of Bishops seemed to be one of them. Generous in almsgiving, and loved by his leudes, he reigned in wisdom and prosperity." As he passed for a saint he had perforce to work miracles. Gregory of Tours tells how a good woman had her son dangerously ill of a fever. She secretly cut off a piece of fringe from the King's mantle and dipped it in a vessel full of water, and by this infusion her son was immediately cured. Gregory adds, "Ofttimes have I heard devils pronounce his name in terror when they were agitated by fury."

Queen Austrehilda, the wife of King Gontram, died in September 581. Before she yielded up the ghost she asked her husband to have the two doctors, who had attended her but failed to cure her, put to death. And Gontram in pious acquiescence had their heads cut off.

But the most interesting personality among the sons of Clotar was Chilperic, King of Neustria. Gregory of Tours regards him as a monster. Chilperic thought that the churches and the religious establishments were becoming far too rich owing to accumulations of gifts from the faithful who, by overwhelming them with the goods of this world, hoped to open the road to heaven for themselves. But Chilperic argued, "Our Treasury is impoverished by this means and our power handed over to the Bishops." So he annulled numerous wills made in favour of the Church and revoked the gifts his father had left it. It is also certain that Chilperic committed abominable crimes from the beginning of his reign to the end—crimes which had become the regular stock in trade of the Frankish princes.

This barbarian had aspirations towards literature and reform; he had artistic tastes and aimed at establishing the glory of his rule on other bases besides that of assassination. One of his attempts at reform is of considerable interest. Several sounds in the Germanic languages could not be expressed by the letters of the Latin alphabet—the th of modern English, the guttural German ch, in such words as auch, rauchen, and lastly the sound represented in modern English by the letter w, as in we, will, what. Chilperic decided that the sound th should be represented by the Greek z, the guttural ch by zh, and the w in question by the letter ϕ , he also wanted the long o , the French o , to be represented by ω , reforms which were both good and practical. Those numerous German words, about which modern scholars are always arguing, would thus have been given a correct form adapted to their pronunciation. Chilperic's reforms, moreover, only applied to Latin and the Roman language, that is to say, to the popular idiom in process of becoming French. As the man of letters he prided himself on being, the Frankish prince despised Teutonic dialects.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As a matter of fact the means to which Chilperic had recourse on behalf of his reforms, energetic though they were, do not seem to have been altogether happy. He gave orders not only that all teaching should thenceforward follow the new method, but that all the books then in existence, written, as we know, on parchment, should be erased with pumice stone and rewritten in the new way. Finally, he decided that anybody who refused to follow his system of writing should have his eyes put out—which was perhaps not the best way of teaching them to write.

After having reformed orthography, Chilperic tried to put order into the Church. The interminable disussions between Arians and Catholics about the Trinity had ended in irritating him also. He wrote a little theological treatise to prove that the Trinity was God without distinction of persons, saying that it was unseemly to say that God was composed of three Persons, as though it were a question of human beings. The Father, according to Chilperic, was the same as the Son, and the Holy Ghost the same as the Father and the Son, these three so called Persons merely representing the different activities of the divine Being, Father, Son and Holy Ghost, in its diverse manifestations for the welfare and salvation of men—a scheme which, for a barbarian prince, was not badly conceived.

Chilperic discussed the matter with the neighbouring bishops—Salvius of Albi and Gregory of Tours, but when they heard what he had to say they only flew into a fury. If the Bishop of Albi, wrote Gregory, had only had the parchment containing the edict in his hands—for Chilperic had formulated his theory in royal edicts—he would have torn it to pieces. The local prelates had recognised the heresy of Sabellius, condemned by the Synod of Alexandria.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Gregory of Tours said to Chilperic, "Let this matter be, pious King; we must follow the teaching of Hilary and Eusebius." Chilperie, who knew neither Hilary nor Eusebius, thought they were still alive. Inflamed with rage, he replied, "I see clearly that, in this matter, Hilary and Eusebius are my enemies!" And no doubt he had a search made for them in order that he might have their eyes put out.

Chilperic was a poet. He composed Latin verses, religious chants, and hymns modelled on those of the priest Sedulius, famous at that time. Aimoin, a monk of the tenth century, has preserved a fragment in honour of Saint Germain. The poet Fortunatus thought Chilperic's verses admirable; Gregory of Tours thought them execrable. The King did not observe the rules of prosody, he mixed everything up together. At all events these tastes of the barbarian King make of him an interesting personality.

Chilperic also had artistic aspirations. Once when Gregory chanced to be with the King on his farm at Nogent-sur-Marne, the latter showed him a great basin of chased gold encrusted with precious stones. "I made that in order to elevate and polish the Frankish nation," he explained to the Bishop, "and I shall make many others if I have time."

He loved old and rare ornaments, and surrounded himself with Jew dealers who unearthed them for him. On another occasion when Gregory was with him at the royal villa at Nogent, and presented himself before him in order to bid him farewell, he describes how he found him with a young Jew named Priscus, with whom he was very friendly, and whom he employed to buy all kinds of precious things.

And now we come to a scene of modern life and find Chilperic a feminist. He wanted to break the Salic law and allow his wife to inherit some property and have the right of succeeding her husband on his death, thus showing himself to be far in advance of the ideas of his contemporaries in this respect. But we have no desire to return to the atmosphere of that terrible period. When the town of Limoges rebelled, Chilperic increased the number of wooden horses used for torture and had crowds of miserable wretches stretched on them, not sparing the clergy.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Like his father, Chilperic had a large number of wives, perhaps even more than the latter. It would be impossible to enumerate them; they were so numerous that the chroniclers became quite confused over them all. One of the first was called Audovera.

Audovera had in her household a young girl of Frankish descent called Fredegonda, of great beauty and courageous spirit. Chilperic fell in love with her. The King had gone with his brother Sigebert, King of Austrasia, on an expedition across the Rhine, when Audovera gave birth to a daughter. Fredegonda persuaded her mistress to act as the baby's sponsor herself, and a Bishop, either ignorant of the canonical regulations or else acting as an accomplice, celebrated the baptism. Chilperic on his return discovered that his wife had acted as godmother to her own daughter. He sent the guilty Bishop into exile and forced Audovera to take the veil like a widow. The repudiated Queen went and shut herself up in a convent in the Mans district where Fredegonda, fifteen years later, had her put to death.

Sigebert, King of Austrasia, and brother of Chilperic, had married a daughter of Athanagild, King of the Spanish Visigoths—the Princess who was to play so great a part under the name of Brunehaut.

Chilperic, wishing to increase the glory of his crown by an alliance of similar magnificence, sued Athanagild for the hand of another of his daughters named Galswintha, a sweet, fragile creature whom Augustin Thuerry describes as follows: "She was a sweet and melancholy figure who moved across the stage of Merovingian barbarism like an apparition from another century."

Athanagild gave his daughter a rich dowry, and Chilperic as a marriage settlement assigned her five towns in Aquitaine, and Galswintha, tearful and terrified, made her way to the awful kingdom of the Franks filled with a vague presentiment of her destiny. She only remained a few months with her husband the King. In 567, the same year in which she became his wife, Chilperic, at the instigation of Fredegonda, had her strangled in her bed, after which he married Fredegonda.

One can imagine the household of these two creatures, the King, barbarous, cruel, suspicious and jealous; the Queen wicked, vindictive, and full of hatred and low ambition. There were violent scenes, with cries and blows. Chilperic was suspicious of his wife, who gave him only too good cause. Fredegonda had three sons, one after the other—Samson, Clodebert and Dagobert. They all three perished in an epidemic. Whereupon Fredegonda remembered that Chilperic still had a son by Audovera, named Clovis.

THE MEROVINGIANS

The young Clovis was in love with a girl in Fredegonda's suite. Fredegonda was possessed of the idea that the girl's mother was a sorceress, who by her wiles had caused the death of the young Princes. The unfortunate girl was flogged until the blood ran down her back in the presence of Clovis, and the mother was put to torture and made to confess what was wanted of her. Clovis himself was sent in chains to Noisy-sur-Marne, where shortly afterwards he was found stabbed to death and at the same time Audovera, Chilperic's first wife, and the mother of Clovis, was strangled in the convent in Le Mans in which she had sought shelter. There remained one child of the marriage between Chilperic and Audovera—a daughter, the sister of Clovis. She was handed over to the soldiers and shut up in a convent in Poitiers.

In 583 another son, called Theodoric, whom Fredegonda had by Chilperic, also died. He too was supposed to have been the victim of sorcery, and several women in his service and one or two women from Paris, who were reputed to be witches, were burnt alive, drowned or quartered.

Mummolus, the prefect of the palace, was looked upon with displeasure by Fredegonda, who declared that he had been the instigator of the crime. He was hanged from a rafter with his hands tied behind his back in order to wrest a confession from him. But in vain. He was then bound to a wheel and flogged with straps for such a long time, says Gregory, that the executioners were tired out; thorns were stuck under the nails of his hands and feet, but his life was spared. After this he was dragged in a chariot to Bordeaux, where he was born, and died as soon as he arrived.

One daughter of Fredegonda and Chilperic survived named Ridegonda. Gregory of Tours has left a significant picture of the relations between mother and daughter. They were always quarrelling and hitting and kicking each other without mercy. One day, when the mother had succeeded in making her daughter bend over a coffer, on the pretext of getting out some jewels from the bottom of it, she shut down the lid on her head and was engaged in strangling her when servants ran up in answer to the cries of the victim.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And this same Fredegonda, convicted of the most atrocious crimes, yet contrived to burn the tax gatherers' registers in order to lighten the burdens of the poor in remembrance of her own lowly origin. When a certain family feud, one of those hereditary quarrels which developed on such a large scale in feudal times, was laying bare a whole district, and the unfortunate inhabitants saw their property being pillaged and their lands ravaged by the partisans of both sides, Fredegonda pacified the country by destroying the two families root and branch and thus delivering the people from the scourge.

Gontram, King of the Burgundians, who claimed to be a lover of justice, had forced Chilperic to give back to Brunchaut, the wife of Sigebert, King of Austrasia and sister of Galswintha, the five towns of Aquitaine which he had given Galswintha as her dowry. Chilperic agreed, but lost no time in going to war with Sigebert. The latter retaliated by having himself proclaimed King of Neustria—the kingdom of Chilperic—at Vitry on the Scarpe. He drove back the forces opposed to him and blockaded them in the town of Tournai in which Fredegonda was shut up. Sigebert felt assured of victory when he was murdered by the emissaries of the woman whom he already regarded as his prisoner (573). The King of Neustria now only had one enemy left—a woman, Brunchaut, the widow of Sigebert. And indeed Brunchaut was quite capable of defending herself.

It is very difficult to form an exact estimate of the character of Brunchaut. Gregory of Tours is full of her praises. She was, according to him, of a pleasing disposition, honest and decent in her morals, prudent in her counsels, and amiable in conversation. The daughter of Athmagild, King of the Spanish Visigoths, and sister of Galswintha, she had married Sigebert I, King of Austrasia in 560. Brought up in the West-religion, she was converted to Catholicism on the occasion of her marriage. She was very beautiful; on this point everybody is of one accord. She was energetic and intelligent, and clever in reaching firm and well-considered decisions.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Brunehaut acted as Regent of Austrasia in the name of her little son Childebert II, who was proclaimed King at the age of five, and maintained the royal prerogatives which the Austrasian nobles were already attacking in their efforts to turn their domains into small independent States. She introduced a system of land registration and, in re-arranging the taxes, aimed at freeing the poor and making the rich pay—a policy which, as we know, was long regarded as monstrous. She tried to put great and small on an equal footing of justice and, whilst combating the abuses arising from privileges of rank and birth, she nevertheless endeavoured to safeguard the aristocracy by maintaining the right of primogeniture and preventing the division of hereditary estates by continual partition. The foundation of a large number of abbeys, amongst them some of the most important, was due to her—in fact she was a veritable “statesman.”

Meroveus, a son of Chilperic and Audovera, had escaped the fury of Fredegonda. He saw Brunehaut, who happened to be in Rouen, fell passionately in love with her and persuaded the Bishop Praetextatus to join them in marriage, a union which the ideas of the age repudiated, on account of the consanguinity of the parties. The fury of Chilperic, fomented by Fredegonda, who recognised a rival in Brunehaut, knew no bounds. The newly-wedded pair had taken refuge in a monastery. They left it under guarantees of safety given by the King of Neustria, but although he allowed Brunehaut to return to Austrasia, he had her son shut up in the monastery of Saint Calais, near Le Mans. The unfortunate Prince made good his escape, and rejoined Brunehaut in Austrasia, but the nobility, who were chafing under the reforming rule of the Queen, had no intention of having the King foisted upon them as well. Meroveus had to take flight once more, and was wandering about in the neighbourhood of Rheims, when he was overtaken by the emissaries of Fredegonda. In order to escape falling into the hands of this cruel woman, he asked a pilfering despot, nevertheless exercised a great influence over the country by the very fact of his existence, which kept factions in check, and was a last brake upon internal dissensions. In what light does Chilperic appear to us? Hardly had the news of his death been announced than disorders broke out (584). The people of Orleans and Blois fell upon the inhabitants of Dunois, pillaging, killing, delivering houses and crops over to the flames, and carrying off anything they could lay their hands on. Whereupon the inhabitants of Dunois, joining with the people of Chartres, invaded their assailants to pay them back in like coin. Gontram, King of Burgundy, the protector of his two nephews in Austrasia and Neustria, took up the reins of authority and order was restored.

THE EARLIEST TIMES'

Tredegonda died in 597, and Brunehaut, rid of her terrible rival, ruled in the name of her grandson Theodebert II, who had become King of Austrasia on the death of his father Childebert II (595), whilst another of her grandsons, Theodoric II, had become King of Burgundy. The two brothers came to blows in 610. "With the help of God," writes Irediger, "Theodoric conquered Theodebert and the battle was once again fought in the Plain of Zulpiech (612). Theodebert was led in chains before his brother, who had him put to death. The King of Austrasia (Theodebert) had with him his little son Meroveus. At the command of Theodoric a soldier seized the child by the leg and dashed his brains out against a wall. Whereupon Theodoric laid hands upon his brother's treasure." And thus Austrasia was reunited to Burgundy.

Soon afterwards Theodoric died also and Brunehaut once more assumed the reins of government in the name of Sigebert II, the bastard son of Theodoric. She was ruling despotic ally, though observing the traditions of a regular government, when the nobles of the country, under the leadership of the Mayor of the Palace in Austrasia and Burgundy, in a movement at the head of which were to be found the ancestors of Charlemagne—Saint Arnoul, Bishop of Metz, and Saint Pepin de Landen, rose in rebellion, assassinated Sigebert II, proclaimed Clotar II, who was King of Neustria, King of Austrasia and Burgundy also, and delivered Brunehaut up to him. And thus Clotar was able to wreak on this old woman—Brunehaut being close on seventy—the implacable hatred of his mother Fredegonda.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Clotar began by putting to death two of his great-grandsons, the children of Theodoric II, after which he put into execution the sentence he had passed upon Brunehaut—a terrible scene, a description of which has been preserved in the so-called chronicle of Fredegar.

After the old woman had been tortured for three days, she was put on a camel and promenaded through the ranks of the soldiers, who covered her with insults and mockery. When this moral torture seemed to have lasted long enough, they tied the Queen quite naked by her hair, and one arm and a leg, to the tail of a fiery horse, and her poor body soon became no more than a torn and bleeding mass (613). And Fredegar, after having described this beautiful punishment, goes on to say of the Prince who had ordered it: “Clotar was full of sweetness, learned in letters, fearing God, the protector of churches and priests, and abandoning himself with great zest to the hunt as well as to women.” The portrait is a mediocre piece of work.

After this Clotar had a few more prominent personages assassinated, and notably a certain Boson, whom he suspected of being in love with the Queen, at the same time applying himself to the best of his ability to the government of his vast estates. He succeeded in reducing the taxes and in restoring the royal domain, and is regarded as the best of the Merovingian kings. Master of Neustria, Austrasia and Burgundy, Clotar re-united in his own hands the territories of the whole of Gaul, which had been continually divided up ever since the death of Clotar I, but in each of the three districts he was obliged to appoint its own Mayor of the Palace. This, as we know, was the title of the chief of the King’s household, who thus found himself placed at the head of the officials and the nobles. Landry was Mayor of the Palace in Neustria, Radon in Austrasia and Warnacaire in Burgundy. And the latter Clotar was obliged to promise to keep in office for life. He tried to depose him after a conspiracy attributed to his son, but was unable to do so owing to the opposition of the nobles. The three kingdoms were reconstituted under one King, but with divisions

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Ragnetruda, what his father had done for him; he handed over to him the kingdom of Austrasia, the leaders of that country insisting upon having a King of their own; after which Dagobert decided that the kingdoms of Neustria and Burgundy should at his death devolve on his son Clovis. He convoked the nobles and Bishops of Austrasia to make them swear on the reliques that this partition should be respected; and the Austrasians consented. The only stipulation was that the Duchy of Dentelin, which the Austrasians had seized, should be returned to the Neustrians and subjected to the rule of Clovis. The Duchy of Dentelin, with its curious name, which played so great a part in the history of that period, included the cities of Boulogne, Thérouanne, Arras, Noyon, Cambrai and Tournai.

We might think we were reading of treaties made between different States. Nevertheless it was after the long reign of Clotar II and the twelve first years of the reign of Dagobert, who both united the whole of Gaul under their rule, that these divisions took place.

It was not the territorial partitions between the sons of the Merovingian kings that created the divisions of Gaul. Procopius, on the contrary, emphasises the unity of policy and government under the four sons of Clovis and the four sons of Clotar I, which filled him with admiration. In speaking of these partitions, Fustel de Coulanges points out that sometimes a town was divided into two or three parts, "and thus we find the Kings fighting for a half or a third of a city." From which it becomes clear how superficial these divisions were; in the north it was a question of armed forces, for the north provided armed bands; in the south it was a question of pots de vin, both literally and figuratively; whilst, on the other hand, we know there were profound divisions under the apparently unified government established by Clotar, and after him by his son Dagobert, in Austrasia, Neustria and Aquitaine. Was it not the victorious Clotar II, the sole master of Gaul, who had to recognise the independence of Austrasia?

The reason for this division was the same as that which was to lead to the rise of the power of the leaders and the destruction of the Merovingian dynasty—the local life which was gradually organised under the guidance of its chief leaders.

THE MEROVINGIANS

the leudes and the Bishops, in groups which became ever more and more compact and by joining together increased their powers of resistance; whilst the government of the princes who succeeded each other after Clovis was unable to wield any real power over the country, any centralised power—the very idea raises a smile.

In the vigour of his youth, Dagobert did not fail to shed a certain military glory over his reign.

In the year 578 the Basques had descended from the Pyrenees, and laid bare the vineyards and the fields, carrying off the inhabitants and their cattle; and these incursions were repeated. The Basques or Vascons ended by installing themselves in the district, which was to be called Gascony after them. Their language, Euskarian, represented the ancient Iberian tongue, although the erudite Auguste Longnon disputes this—an “agglutinative” language which cannot be made to fit into the so-called Indo-European group of languages. In 602, Theodebert II and Theodoric II had undertaken an expedition against the Basques which ended in an agreement, leaving them a national Duke under the vague suzerainty of the Franks. But the indomitable little race returned to their pillaging manœuvres. In 637 Dagobert brought them into subjection, for a time at least, for, after him, their Duke Yon renewed the conflict, and became the head of an independent State which was ruled in succession by the Dukes Hunald and Waifar or Gaifier.

Dagobert forced the Breton chiefs to present themselves before him in his villa at Saint Ouen as obedient subjects. He conducted expeditions as far as the Elbe, against the Wends, who were led by a common Frank called Samo, who seems to have been an extraordinary character. Under the walls of Egra, Samo defeated the army sent by Dagobert. He had abjured Catholicism in order to embrace the religion of the Slavs. He had twelve wives and thirty-seven children.

The young King of the Franks had the Salic law revised. In 628–629 he paid a visit to Burgundy in order to conduct an inquiry into the manner of government and the administration of justice in that country. The chroniclers, Fredegar and the monk of Saint Denis, speak of this with emotion. “His arrival," says Fredegar, "filled the Bishops and Leudes with fear, but gave great joy to the poor, for the King rendered them justice." A description which unexpectedly raises before our eyes the image of Saint Louis. "At Langres the King judged great and small with so much equity that every man regarded him as pleasing before God." The chronicler thought it necessary to add : "Neither gifts, rank nor station had any weight with him" Similar scenes were enacted at Chalon sur-Sâone, and afterwards at Auxerre, Autun and Sens. The young Prince neither ate nor slept, for he would not allow anyone to leave his presence without having obtained justice. It was during this journey that Dagobert, "having entered the bath before daybreak," says Fredegar, had Bromulso put to death; after which, on reaching Romilly, he repudiated his wife Gomitruda in order to marry Nanthilda, a daughter of the people, "but of an admirable beauty," observes the monk of Saint Denis.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The reign of Dagobert is the most brilliant period in the monarchy of the fifth and sixth centuries. He may be regarded as the Louis XIV of the Merovingians. If the Roi Soleil had the good fortune to be served by great ministers, Dagobert had the still better luck of being served and advised by saints; for he was surrounded by saints, from Saint Arnulf, Bishop of Metz, who was his teacher, to Saint Floyssus, Bishop of Noyon, who was his treasurer and goldsmith. His referendary was Saint Ouen, Bishop of Rouen, and as members of his council he had Saint Cunibert, Bishop of Cologne, and Saint Amind, Bishop of Tongres.

Saint Floyssus dazzled the Court by the splendour of his golden girdles. He made a throne of solid gold for the King and for the basilica of Saint Denis a great golden cross inlaid with emeralds, amethysts and rubies. "The blessed Floyssus, who was held to be the most skilful goldsmith in the kingdom," says the monk of Saint Denis, "helped also, no doubt, by his piety, executed with admirable art, not only this cross, but also all the ornaments in the basilica. The goldsmiths of to day [end of the seventh century] are accustomed to say that there is hardly a man, however skilful he may be in other ways, who can work gold in this way and encrust it with precious stones, owing to the fact that, for many years, the science of melting rare metals has fallen into desuetude."

THE MEROVINGIANS

Dagobert died when he was still young on the 19th of January, 639, in his villa at Epinay-sur-Seine. He was a King who had been very fond of money, and left behind him a reputation for avarice; but he founded the Abbey of Saint Denis. He committed a few murders, so as not to break the traditions of his ancestors, and brought joy to the hearts of countless numbers of fair and honest dames.

His pious biographer, the monk of Saint Denis, sums up his reign in the following precious lines :

"King Dagobert, it is true, committed a few reprehensible actions from the religious point of view, for no man can be perfect. Nevertheless it must be believed that all the alms and the prayers to saints, with which he adorned the monuments and enriched the churches, more than any of the kings who had gone before him had done, in order that he might reclaim his soul, must have obtained for him without difficulty the pardon of all-merciful God."

Such was the psychology of the time, the psychology of the chroniclers, all of them ecclesiastics, to whom we owe our knowledge of the people we are studying and of all these kings, conquerors and captains, rapers and robbers, murderers, traitors, knaves and perjurors who pass before our eyes in an uninterrupted procession. But what can you expect? As the good monk says, nobody can be perfect, and so many magnificent gifts to the churches, monasteries and servants of God, with the help of the prayers of the saints which enriched the altars, could not fail, in the end, to secure their eternal salvation.

Prematurely exhausted by his numerous wives, Dagobert died—of old age—when he was thirty-four (639). His eldest Mayor of the son, Sigebert, who was seven or eight at the time, Palace and had already been King of Neustria for six years; "Bois Fainéants." whilst his son Clavis, who was four or five, had just been recognized King of Neustria and Burgundy. With the death of Dagobert the rule of the Merovingian kings really came to an end, and we enter upon the era of the administration of the Mayors of the Palace and the reign of the “Rois Fainéants” or Sluggard Kings. Fainéant did not mean a king who did not wish to do anything, like the modern word “feignant,” feigning, not “fainéant”—“fainéant” meant one who was unable to do anything.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The picture drawn by Eginhard, the historian and adviser of Charlemagne, is famous :

“ Except for the title and the means of existence allowed him by the Mayor of the Palace, the King possessed no property of his own except one domain, which brought but little revenue, and a house and a few servants to provide him with the necessities of life. When he had to go on a journey he drove in a chariot drawn by a yoke of bullocks and led by a rustic drover. It was in this equipage that he presented himself at the Palace, or the popular assembly, which met once a year for the good of the kingdom, and then returned to his home.”

The truth of this picture has been contested, but it cannot be destroyed. A general outline is given in it with strokes that are too vivid for us to allow them to be blotted out.

The Mayoralty of the Palace was an institution peculiar to the Merovingian epoch. We have already described the great Gallo-Roman domains, many of which became the property of the Merovingian kings who, as we have seen, made them their favourite places of residence. Landowners who did not administer their domains themselves, handed them over to the care of a steward, who took the title of major, meaning “greater,” since he was set in authority over his subjects. The major domus, the “mayor” of the household, became in the royal household the “Mayor of the Palace.”

At first, in the sixth century, the Mayors of the Palace exercised relatively unimportant functions; but their power continued to grow. At the beginning of the eighth century the authority of the Mayor was greater than that of the King himself. He had the direction and administration of the royal palace and jurisdiction over all the visitors and dependants within its walls. Under the embryonic hereditary government of the early Merovingians the Palace was the State. The towns were ruled by the Bishops, and the country districts by the large landowners. The Dukes and Counts, who represented the royal authority outside the Palace, were themselves named nated by the Mayor, who was the head of the administration. The Mayor of the Palace was supreme in the royal domains and the farms and villas the produce of which constituted the regular resources of the monarchy. In the absence of the King, the Mayor presided over his tribunals and commanded his armies. It is easy to imagine how frequent these "absences" became under dissipated, incapable kings, or minors.

THE MEROVINGIANS

How quick must have been the growth of the power of the Mayors during the minority of little princes like Sigebert II and Clovis II! We have already described the "recommendation" by means of which men who were too weak to defend themselves and their property placed themselves under the protection of important personages. The King had such protégés, and amongst them, in a higher social scale, those who had put themselves in trust with the King by close bonds of association attaching them to his person. These antrustions formed his bodyguard, and were drawn from the ranks of warriors of high social standing and birth. They were attached to the King by oath. But even over them the Mayors of the Palace extended their authority.

Benjamin Guérard, with his usual clarity of thought, sums up the situation very vividly when he depicts the Merovingian kings as "ruling, or rather dominating, not so much the country and peoples of Gaul, as the armed bands which overran and pillaged it." The King had his "band," which was the largest and strongest; the Mayor of the Palace had his. From the day on which the Mayor's band became stronger than the King's and the Mayor even laid hands on the royal band, the power of the King ceased to exist.

After the death of Dagobert, Neustria, whose King was a child of five, was governed by the Mayor of the Palace, Aega, and Austrasia, whose Sovereign was a child of seven, by the Mayor Pepin de Landen, an ancestor of Charlemagne. They were both men of worth. The monk who acted as the guide of Dagobert in his lifetime has left us a portrait of Aega. "He surpassed all the nobility of Neustria. He was of noble birth, rich, a friend of justice and clever in speech and reply; but a few accused him of avarice." In the fourth year of the reign of the little Clovis in Neustria, that is to say, in 641,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Aega died. The Queen, Nantilda, went with her little son to Orleans, which was in the kingdom of Burgundy, and there convoked the nobility, the Dukes and the Bishops of the country. They arrived in great numbers, and the Queen, says Fredegar, "by the unanimous vote of the Bishops and Dukes raised to the dignity of Mayor of the Palace Floachat, who was a Frank by birth, and gave him her niece Ragnoberta in marriage."

From this time forward the Mayors of the Palace were no longer even in the nomination of the King or his representatives, but were appointed by the nobles. The following comparison is characteristic. If we examine the list of the Mayors of the Palace who succeeded each other up to the death of Dagobert, we shall find that their number is greater than that of the kings who reigned during the same period in Gaul; whilst, after Dagobert, the number of the kings is larger. Up to and during the reign of Dagobert the kings deposed mayors who had ceased to please them, replacing them by others whom they preferred. But after Dagobert it was the mayors who deposed the kings.

Amongst the nobility of the kingdom, the most important were the Bishops. "They formed," says Maurice Prou, "an aristocracy more powerful than the aristocracy." The Bishops. The Bishops were the princes of those barbarian days, and it might almost be said that from the fall of the Roman Empire to the accession of the Capets, that is to say, for five hundred years, the Bishops were the leaders of society, not only from the religious point of view, but in every possible way. It was they who raised Charlemagne to power. And this period constitutes the great epoch of the Church, when she was strong, fertile and creative.

The Catholic Church was not during the first few centuries of her existence the huge centralised body into which she subsequently developed. The Pope was called the Bishop of Rome; he took precedence over his colleagues, but he did not rule them, and had no voice in their election. The unity of dogma, which was upheld with such severity against the heretics, such as the Arians, the Sabellians and the Pelagians, depended upon episcopal assemblies, Councils and Synods, but not on a single pontifical decision. The Catholic world was composed of a federation of churches each one of which was governed by its own Bishop and held sway over the territory of a city.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Thus the Church borrowed her administrative boundaries from the Roman Empire and animated them with the intense vitality which at that time constituted her active power. The identity of the Gallic Bishopries with the Roman cities was, with few exceptions, almost complete.

The Bishops were great personages, not only on account of their prestige and secular power, but also frequently owing to their personal valour and their family position. Many of them in the fifth century were of senatorial descent. And, in keeping with the spirit of tradition which had grown up through various careers and trades being kept in one family, all the Bishops of Tours, as Gregory of Tours points out, were, with about five exceptions, relatives of his own. The priest Euphronius had been raised to the bishopric of Tours. King Clotar, who was in favour of another candidate, inquired into the motives underlying the election. The reply was, "Euphronius is the nephew of the Bishop of Langres," and the King gave way.

In those days of lively faith, the authority of the Bishops was very great. See how they spoke to the King. Saint Germain, Bishop of Paris, said to Sigebert, "If you do not depart from your intention of killing your brother [Chilperic] you will return victorious, otherwise you will perish."

The Church held a man in her power through the crimes he had committed, the remorse with which they had inspired him, and the threat of eternal damnation which would be his punishment and from which she alone could absolve him. She held him by fear; but she also held him by beauty, mildness and joy. Her doctrine founded on hope brought comfort to sorrowing souls. The ceremonies of her worship, in which all could join, with their magnificent services, their hymns and chants, the splendour of the setting, the perfume of the incense and the charm of the heavenly music, provided the utmost beauty those days could offer. On liturgical feast days the sufferings of every wounded heart could not fail to be alleviated.

Moreover, the Bishop, with his high authority, in his vestments glittering with gold and precious stones, surrounded by the magic of the religious ceremonies, seemed to the masses a sacred being. He was called upon in his own lifetime to work divine miracles; and he succeeded, not by reason of his virtues, but from the very fact that he was a Bishop. And if a Bishop did not work the cures expected of him, it was because he did not wish to do so; and he was held responsible. "If I die," said Ulfus to Saint Germain (Bishop from 555 to 576), "you will be responsible, and the King and my family will come and demand a reckoning from you." We do not know whether the threat moved the holy prelate, but the fact remains that Ulfus was cured. It was regarded as great good fortune to possess a few words written by a Bishop on a scrap of parchment; they were boiled, and the infusion thus produced was more efficacious than the prescriptions of the leading lights of medicine.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And of this authority the Bishops made good use. They developed the works of peace; they maintained the right of asylum in the holy places. And this right of asylum was extended not only to the basilica, but to the atrium leading into it and the ecclesiastical buildings surrounding the vestibule. The Councils did all they could to guarantee the right of asylum, which was open even to murderers. It provided a refuge for slaves, whose masters were not allowed to have them back until they had sworn not to inflict any corporal punishment upon them.

The moral authority of the Bishops was doubled by their secular power. The domains in the possession of the episcopacy were very considerable and they constantly increased in size. They were inhabited by serfs and cultivators—and slaves—who were not allowed to leave them. Certain Bishops, like the Bishop of Le Mans and the Bishop of Cahors, who possessed over thirty domains, found themselves rulers over 15,000 or 20,000 subjects—princes of a little kingdom. And these domains continued to grow, partly through their own development and partly through the gifts of the faithful desirous of accomplishing a pious work. The Councils formally forbade any alienation of episcopal property. A Bishop was only allowed to concede the use by usufruct of this or that portion of land, so that the right of possession was not violated. There were the rights of mortmain. By the end of the eighth century the property of the Church included a third of Gaul.

THE MEROVINGIANS

The Bishop was supported by the mass of the people by whom he was elected. The basilica was the place in which the inhabitants of the town—and of the city—met together to discuss their common interests, frequently under the guidance of the Bishop. He was the protector of the weak who sought shelter beneath the pastoral crook; and his power increased accordingly. In every way and from every direction, private individuals of all sorts and conditions tried to release themselves from the chaos of the various conflicting authorities in Gaul, in order to come and “recommend” themselves to the Bishop, whereby the number of his subjects continued to increase. When, towards the end of the sixth century, Chilperic said that public authority had passed from the Crown to the cities, he meant to the Bishops.

The writers of the sixth century congratulated the Bishops, who proved themselves the active defenders of their flocks. The Bishops opposed the exactions and injustices of which the Counts representing the royal power continued to be guilty. They played the part of defensor civitatis, defenders of the Gallo-Roman city, though without having directly inherited the position by virtue of an edict or a law. The transmission of authority had been made by force of circumstances.

“The Bishops,” says Fustel de Coulanges, “seem to have been regular political chiefs without rivals in their respective cities.” The town in which they lived rendered them obeisance, and they arranged for its defence against all aggression. Consider Autun, Rheims, and Sens. They were ruled by their Bishops, who conducted the manœuvres in sieges, and put themselves at the head of the sorties directed against the enemy.

Bishops, and among them saints, might be seen raising troops, marching out to war, and fighting valiantly. When Ebroin, the Mayor of the Palace, was in the midst of a conflict with Saint Leger, Bishop of Autun, who with his men had engaged him in battle and was on the point of surrender, reinforcements under the command of Saint Genès, Archbishop of Lyons,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This incident was regarded as a sign from God, and Rusticus was elected by acclamation.

These customs of the primitive Church still retained their vigour under Clovis, though the King had already arrogated to himself the right of presenting candidates, who on that account alone stood the best chance of carrying the vote. And thus, between the provincial Bishops, under the presidency of the Metropolitan, and the people a new factor was introduced, that of the King. To the right of presenting candidates, the Merovingian dynasty, from the time of Clovis, added that of confirming the election when it had been made.

It is easy to understand that, with the right of presentation and the right of confirmation thus arrogated to themselves by the kings, the episcopal elections soon fell entirely into their hands. In 515, four years after the death of Clovis, the Arverni chose Quintianus to succeed their Bishop Eufrasius who had died. But another personage of the district, a very rich man, presented himself before King Theodoric and by means of gifts persuaded him to designate him as the successor of Eufrasius, and it was he who, in spite of the election which had already taken place, occupied the episcopal throne. And this custom unfortunately became universal, and simony was the rule. Even the kings who professed the greatest devotion to the Church, like King Gontram of Burgundy, disregarded the protestations of the Pope, and sold the bishoprics for ready money.

Furthermore there were quarrels, intrigues and conflicts between the popular electors themselves. When the bishopric of Autun became vacant in 657, the choice of the new Bishop led to such violent struggles that blood was spilt. One of the two candidates was killed in the fray, and the other was driven out of the town. The conflict lasted for two years, when Queen Bathilda, who was acting as Regent during the minority of her son, Clotar III, appointed Saint Leger to the see of Autun (659).

In Paris a Syrian merchant named Euschius won the crozier and mitre by bribing the electors. And behold him on the episcopal throne proceeding to canonical investiture and administering his diocese as though he were in his country.

THE MEROVINGIANS

house. The Bishop's palace was packed with Syrians conducting all manner of business in their outlandish jargon.

At other places, such as Gap, Embrun and Rheims, the episcopal thrones were occupied by ruffians who won them, not by spending money right and left like the Syrian Eusebius, but in the way that Clovis had won his throne, with the battle-axe and the dagger.

Gontram, King of Burgundy, rewarded one of his officials, who had informed him of the treachery of the patrician Mummolus, by appointing him Bishop of Geneva; but in spite of these facts, it must be confessed that the choice made by the princes generally fell upon men of merit. A prelate like Cautin who, as Bishop of Clermont, committed the most atrocious crimes, was an exception. The princes liked to appoint to sacred offices one or other of their palatines whose moral worth and capacity they had proved; for even the worst of the Merovingian kings—and it is difficult to choose between them—found it in their own interest to give to the people leaders who could maintain order, peace and prosperity. The choice of the princes frequently fell upon members of the laity. A few, like Chilperic, appointed ecclesiastics only as exceptions. His son, Clotar II, who has the reputation of being the best of the Merovingian kings, by an edict of 614, expressly reserved to himself the right of appointing to the bishoprics those of his officials whom he considered deserved a reward for their services. And the people, for their part, found it to their advantage to have a Bishop who, by his close connection with the Court, was able to obtain them numerous favours.

These appointments from the laity must not surprise us, since we find the Bishops themselves, when an episcopal vacancy was placed in their hands to fill, deciding in favour of lay candidates. The town of Bourges was the capital of the province, Aquitania Secunda. It was the custom, when the election of a metropolitan Bishop became necessary, for the prelates of the whole province to meet together to superintend it. Apollonius Sidonius, Bishop of Clermont, went to Bourges for this purpose, and found the people divided into opposing factions. So great was the number of candidates for the see, writes Sidonius, that sitting close up against one another they

THE EARLIEST TIMES

If we take into account all the details given above we shall realise the growing importance of the Bishops in the kingdom of the Franks and the ever greater part they were to be called upon to play.

Having discussed the Bishops, we must now turn to the masters of the great domains.

As we have already seen, the Frankish conquest had altered the division of the land very little. Clovis seized the domains of the Roman Treasury, and the State lands. There were, with very few exceptions, no other and the Right of Immunity.

And thus the large estates continued, after Clovis, to be the chief instruments for the exploitation of the land, just as they had been before his time.

The domain was called villa, or fundus, whence the French word fonds, real estate. The villa had a name, the name of one of its owners, which was handed down under succeeding owners. In the early days an owner was often called Flavinius, the domain of such a man became in the north Flavy, in the south Flaviac; Flavinius was responsible for Flavignac, Flavigny and Flavin; Sabinus for Savigny, Sévigny, Savignac, La Savinière, Les Savinières, etc., names which are still to be found in the place names of France, since, for reasons to be given later, the majority of modern French villages—nine out of ten of them—have developed out of the old Merovingian domains. Many of these villas even became towns. The villa Spirnacu, which was sold to Saint Remi, is to-day Epernay. The tenants on the domain, whose various plots covered the countryside, were grouped together in houses close to each other, at a short distance from the casa dominica, the mansion of the master. And in every villa, in every domain, there grew up around the life on the estate and the practice of agriculture, a whole system of industry calculated to make the villa self-supporting. There was a monastery served by a priest whose livelihood was assured by the proprietor of the estate. The majority of the rural parishes of France owe their origin to this. The officiating priest found himself endowed with two or three manses, the mense being a collection of lands judged sufficient for the support of a family.

THE MEROVINGIANS

The buildings and the lands composing a villa were divided into four groups. The first included the mansion of the master, the casa dominica, with its various buildings of all kinds. In front of the mansion there was a court, which played a great part in the life of the community, and was enclosed by walls to which the buildings for the household staff were contiguous; beyond which came a kitchen garden, a small park and an orchard. This first group was surrounded by a wall or a moat enclosed by a palisade. Gregory of Tours describes one of these residences, which he calls a château, which was besieged by Theodoric, the son of Clovis. It was the Chastel-Merliac (Cantal, in the arrondissement of Mauriac). "In the middle was a pond with sweet water for drinking; in another part there were fountains so abundant that they formed a stream of fresh water which ran out through the gate of the place; in short, this fortress enclosed such a large space that the inmates cultivated the ground inside it and gathered fruits in abundance."

A second group consisted of the neighbouring lands directly exploited for the profit of the master by a population of slaves or serfs; this constituted the former's manse.

A third group included lands upon which there lived serfs, cultivators or lites (enfranchised slaves), as well as free men, cultivating the lots they had been assigned or which they voluntarily held from the master. They cultivated them for their own personal profit and as they pleased in return for the rendering of dues, which might take the form, in varying proportions, of payment in kind, rent in money or in labour, that is to say, work done for the benefit of the proprietor. These were slave manses (occupied by slaves or serfs) or ingennils (ingéniles) occupied by free men.

The manse consisted of a farm to which was attached a certain amount of land which belonged to it for ever and in principle could never be taken away. It generally constituted a rural establishment which was more or less self-supporting and capable, as we have just pointed out, of ensuring the livelihood of the family who worked on it.

The master of the domain furthermore exercised rights of marriage, was entitled to the best piece of furniture in a legacy, and when the deceased left no heirs, the possession of the whole heritage. He also had the right of levying fines for certain misdemeanours.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Finally, the fourth part of the domain included lands of some importance which, at the pleasure of the master, were common to all the tenants, serfs, lites and cultivators—meadows and pasture lands, commons and forests, the latter providing wood, acorns and pasturage for pigs. They were the origin of the common lands of a village.

Thus the importance of a Merovingian villa was far greater than that of the seigniorial domain which existed under the Ancien Régime in France and which were only the remnants of it. "What corresponded with the Merovingian dominium were the cattle, the village and all the lands of the community taken together" (Fustel de Coulanges).

Small domains were sometimes wedged into these large estates, and their fate was far from enviable. They were suffocated. Unfortunate owners of a few acres wedged into the lands of a rich lord were to be found who were obliged to submit to servitude and give up their fields and vineyards to him in order to be able to live.

A single property aimed at including land and produce of every imaginable kind—cornfields, meadows, vineyards, flax fields, willow groves, tall forests and coppices. The overlord placed at the disposal of his tenants, free men, cultivators, serfs and slaves, for their common use, mills, ovens, presses, forges and a brewery, from which the compulsory feudal services of the Middle Ages were not derived, but which had a similar origin and raison d'être. The mills were worked by water or by labour, windmills being still unknown in Europe.

Thus each of these great domains constituted an economic unit which was self supporting. The produce of the ground was consumed on the spot and needs of all kinds were supplied by the work of the slaves. This was the system prevalent in the royal villas in Gaul of the 5th century.

The industry of the fortified towns became ~~more numerous~~ in this respect as compared with the work of the artisans in

THE MEROVINGIANS

Gallo-Roman times, not to mention the Gallic industries in the days of Vereingotorix, was far-reaching.

The villages properly so-called, the vici, as they were termed in Latin, tended equally to disappear. The whole of Gaul was organised into domains and villas. Fustel de Coulanges declares that in Gaul of the seventh century he has only been able to discover about fifty villages as compared with twelve hundred villas. And even so these villages do not seem to have been centres of culture or of life, but merely stations along the great highways, placed at cross-roads, places of exchange at given points, regular stopping places with houses for shelter and rest, stabling for horses and what we call inns, together with wheelwrights' sheds for repairing carriages and harness. Or else they were little religious centres, where the remembrance of some venerated saint or some legendary event attracted the faithful and gave birth to a small local industry.

We have enumerated the causes which had led to the concentration of the possession of the land in ever fewer and fewer hands—the exactions of the Treasury, the depredations of the marauders, the scourge of the invasions and internal troubles. It was necessary to form groups around powerful individuals and thus create centres of resistance.

In a state of society which was becoming ever more and more troubous, the weak and isolated man could not protect his land. He accordingly “recommended” himself, that is to say, placed himself under the protection of a powerful personage. It was his only alternative. He might have sold his property perhaps. But what could he have done with the money in a world in which commerce and industry had been destroyed? Personal property had ceased to have any value. He was obliged to keep his land by remaining attached to it and cultivating it under the protecting rule of an overlord.

In a villa each living was worked by the tenant, whether serf, cultivator, or free man, who was attached to it, and the domain of the master was developed by the work of all.

The owner of an estate very rarely looked after it himself, but confided the care of it to a steward, whom the Romans called villicus and the Merovingians, as we have already observed, called major, mayor.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The ties which constituted the unity of the villa were so strong, so binding and so firmly rooted in the soil, that even the partition of the domain could not break them. We must bear in mind the various hereditary bonds which kept a man on the piece of land he inhabited and which also subjected him to the rule of the villa. It sometimes happened that a villa was divided up between several proprietors without its unity being destroyed as far as the tenants inhabiting it were concerned. In this respect a Merovingian villa might be compared to a modern industrial concern, the administration of which is divided up between several people without its unity being interfered with as regards the shareholders and the working staff.

When the Franks arrived in Gaul these villas were only fortified by palisades and ditches, which formed an obstacle against aggression. They were situated in fertile plains on the banks of rivers and streams which facilitated their cultivation, but the consequences of the growing chaos under the barbarous administration of the Merovingians may well be imagined. All intellectual and artistic life and all culture were gradually stilled and sought a silent refuge in the monasteries. All the amenities of existence were withered at the root, and brutality and violence everywhere carried the day, so that the Gallo-Roman land-owners themselves came to adopt the tone of the royal Court.

Imagine these domains separated from each other by long distances, cut off by wide stretches of forest, marshland and uncultivated or devastated territory. The villas, with all their rustic belongings, followed the example of the monasteries, and left the easily-cultivated plains and the navigable rivers in order to climb the hill-sides, hoist themselves on to the heights and there fortify their position. They surrounded themselves with walls, and many of them became fortresses. And Glareus, in his history of French institutions, was able to write. "The proprietor of a huge villa, surrounded by his cultivators and slaves, was indeed a veritable seigneur." And this was the name by which his tenants knew him.

He became, says Fustel de Coulanges, within the limits of his domain, "the head of a State."

The head of a State whose importance continued to be great. The population of a domain was sometimes over a thousand souls, acknowledging no other authority than that of the master, who exercised the right of jurisdiction over them, even over the free men. Far from opposing this authority the Kings supported it. It was in the royal interest for a "seigneur" to rule his property well, to maintain peace and order and increase his prosperity, for the King's government was incapable of accomplishing this. For the task of administration the traditions of the ruler and organised units are prerequisites, and the royal authority under Chilperic, Clotar II, and Dagobert had neither the one nor the other. The de facto administrators were the Bishops and the heads of domains. The villa of the eighth century had become an institution for public order.

THE MEROVINGIANS

We have just said that the majority of modern French villages are derived from Merovingian villas. In the seventh century the word "villa" still meant a domain, in the eighth it already designated a village with its lands. In addition to the word "village" we also find villaris, meaning an "annex," a dependent hamlet of the village. The villa, that is to say the village, formed a rural parish to which the villaris, the dependent hamlet, was attached.

The proprietor of a large domain, the "seigneur," found his authority still further increased by the development of the right of immunity. We have already described this right as enjoyed by the Church, but it was no less important in the case of the laity.

The following is a definition of it according to Marculf :

"We ordain," says the King, "that such and such a person, a man of good repute, shall hold in full possession the villa bearing such and such a name, and that no royal official shall have the right of entering it for the purpose of imposing judicial fines, or for any cause whatsoever."

But this did not mean that the King renounced his rights; he still exercised them through the medium of the seigneur, the Bishop, the Abbot, or the great landed proprietor. Fustel de Coulanges says that, by the right of immunity, the royal authority, far from being weakened, was actually strengthened. And indeed it was under that one of the Merovingians whose power was the most secure, under the monarch, who in those troublous times enjoyed the most firmly established authority, under Dagobert I, that the right of immunity made the greatest strides in its development.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The man enjoying this privilege, the beneficiary, became in return the "loyal servant" of the King. The favour thus conferred upon him bound him to his sovereign by exceedingly close personal ties. He owed him fealty. The King continued to exercise jurisdiction, to levy taxes, to recruit men at arms, and to levy the fines inflicted in his name, but he no longer did so directly, but through the medium of a loyal servant to whom he had delegated his power, a servant who was, so to speak, responsible to him. And it is certain that in principle the right of immunity fortified the royal authority as long as those who enjoyed the privilege were mindful of their duties and faithfully discharged on behalf of their prince the royal prerogatives he had conceded to them. But what happened in the course of time? The inhabitants of a domain, who had a relationship only with their overlord, soon came to regard him as the only one entitled to exercise authority over them, and gradually the tenant became transformed into a subject. And thus the authority of the overlord grew stronger and stronger and led him to form in his own mind the desire of making it entirely independent. Added to this there were the endless civil wars of the Merovingian kings, their private murders, the disorders produced by the fresh invasions, the Slav, German and Saracen invasions, which together with the long minorities of the reigning princes, during which regents and above all Mayors of the Palace ruled, who pleased one party but not another, made people feel that they were not bound by ties of fealty as they were to a monarch.

And the movement which, following upon the granting of the right of immunity, gradually detached the owner of the privilege from the royal power, was further aggravated by the fact that the former having pledged his faith to the King and become his faithful servant, and the King having in return taken him under his protection, under his tutelage and charge to defend him and his, no longer found himself in a position to fulfil his part.

THE MEROVINGIANS

Fustel de Coulanges has shown how the right of immunity, granted over and over again from the sixth to the eighth century, impereetibly modified the soeial constitution of Gaul. It profoundly modified the subjection of the nobility to the throne, and it also altered their authority over their subordinates. In his domains, which continued to grow ever larger and larger, the overlord beeame the sovereign and was no longer bound to his own sovereign except by moral ties and by the sentiment—very strong, it is true, in the ease of loyal souls in periods of order, but exceedingly unreliable among the selfishly inclined in times of trouble—the sentiment of loyalty.

* * * * * * *

Let us now sum up the situation in Gaul towards the middle of the seventh eentury. In Austrasia and Neustria two children occupied the throne and their minority was followed by other minorities. A powerful aristocracy had divided the kingdom between them, great landed proprietors who were sovereigns in their own domains, Bishops all-powerful in their cities, Abbots who ruled over their monasteries, numerous coneerns and wide territories; and finally Dukes and Counts, the representatives of the King in the provincees, but who had in fact become hereditary and independent rulers. Between all these "majores" —the "greatest" in the land—hierarchies and groups had been created. The system of proteetion, fealty and recommendation whieh we have deseribed formed ranks in society through the creation of proteetors and proteeted, a hierarehy maintained by ties which were strong in a different way from the tutelage of the kings, simee they were direct. An example drawn from Fredegar will make the pieture more vivid.

The patrician Willibad was summoned to Chalon-sur-Saône in the name of Clovis II. The powerful overlord, well aware of the immunity he enjoyed owing to the existenee of the Mayor of the Palae, came followed by a strong retinue. "Brave and eourageous men," says Fredegar. It was a regular army whieh would not have hesitated to give battle to the supporters of the King.

And if we turn to the frontiers we find that in Germany the peoples who had been subjugated by the descendants of Clovis had raised their heads again and claimed their independenee—

THE EARLIEST TIMES

the Thuringians, the Alemanni and the Bavarians had liberated themselves, and were ruled by their own princes. The Armoricans along the coast, and the Basques or Vascons in Gascony, once more appeared as free marauding peoples. The separatist spirit, which we have already noted in the case of the Austrasians, the Neustrians and the Burgundians, continued to grow, and formed ever deeper and deeper divisions throughout the greater part of Gaul. And the invasions started afresh, Slavs and Saxons in the north-east, and later on, in the south of Gaul, the Saracens !

Nevertheless, in spite of this general decline, in spite of the obvious threat, not only of disorganisation, but of annihilation, the idea of royalty still maintained its power, and was preserved, not only by tradition, but also by necessity; for the people who formed the substratum of the nation in the midst of these endless, diverse and unco-ordinated bids for wealth and power still lived and worked, the people of France!—the old Celto-Ligurian stock—a fine, strong race, which kept its unity, though nothing else did—a basic unity and an uncorrupted soul. Eight hundred years had passed over its head since the death of Vercingetorix, bringing in their train heavy trials and burdens—the Roman conquest, the Roman administration, the Roman system of fraud, weakness and shame, followed by the victory of the Franks, their robbery, pillage, barbarism, anarchy and their mad acts of bloodshed and filth—but still the people worked, toiled, loved and suffered, indomitable in their vital strength. If heroism existed, let us not connect it with the name of Cæsar, Clovis or Charlemagne; heroism was there—in the masses! It made its virtue shine forth by breathing strength into Christianity and endowing it with its sublime impetus; and it preserved the means of salvation through its living faith. Royalty was represented by unworthy princes and became incarnate in children; it was surrounded by conspiracies and rivalries, treacherous and bloodstained, but nevertheless it was royalty with the spirit of Christianity ineradicably rooted in the spirit of the people. Christianity alone was able to maintain social unity and sovereign justice between the conflicting parties, the rival overlords and clashing interests. In Gaul, thus divided, a prey to the worst forms of violence, affording a spectacle of complete chaos and anarchy, there remained but one force for the preservation of union and unity, and one alone. Whether placed in the hands of a feeble child, a sluggard king or a bloodthirsty madman, it remained nevertheless the greatest power of the age, for it was founded upon the immutable energy and faith of a whole people devoted to that which assured its salvation.

THE MEROVINGIANS

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—Salvienus, Works, edited by Halm, 1877. Apollonius Sidonius, edited by Baret, 1879. Grégoire de Tours, Historia Francorum, edited by Omont et Colon, 1886–1893, 2 vols. Poems of Fortunatus, edited by Leo from Monum. Germ. hist., series in 4to. So-called Chronicle of Fredeggar and his Continuators, edited by Gabr. Monod, 1883. Marius d'Avenches, edited by Mommsen, 1893. Gesta regum Francorum, edited by Krusch, 1888. Aimoine, Historia Francorum, edited by D. Bouquet; Rec. des Hist. de la Gaule, Vol. III. Roricon, De Gestis Francorum, edited by D. Bouquet, ibid. Jordanes (Jornandes), edited by Mommsen, 1882. Cassiodorus, edited by Mommsen, from Monum. Germ. hist., Auct. antiquiss., XII, 1894. Paul Diaere (Warnefried), Historia Langobardorum, edited by Waitz, 1878. Zosimus, Historiae Romanae, edited by Mendelssohn, 1887. Procopius, De Bello Gotlico, edited by Dom. Comparetti, 1885. Vie de Saint Rémi, edited by Krusch, from Monum. Germ. hist., Auct. antiquiss., Vol. IV. Prosper Tiro, edited by Mommsen, from Chronica Minor, Vol. I. Vie de Saint Léger, from D. Bouquet, Rec. des Hist. de la Gaule, Vol. II. Gesta Dugoberti, edited by Krusch, 1888. The Nibelungen, edited by Bartsch, 1870–1880, 3 vols. Lui Salique, edited by Holder, 1879–80. Loi des Burgondes, edited by Bluhme, from Monum. Germ. Hist. Leges, Vol. II. Loi Romaine des Wisigoths, edited by Haenel, 1849. Formulaire de Mareulfe, edited by Rozière, 1860, 2 vols. Ampère, Hist. Litt. de la France av. Charlemagne, 3rd ed., 1870. Bayet, Pfister et Kleinekausz, Hist. de France, edited by Ern. Lavisse, Vol. II, 1913. Abbé Dubois, Hist. erit. de l'établissement de la monarchie franque dans les Gaules, 1735, 3 vols. Fustel de Coulanges, La Monarchie Franque, 1888; L'Alleu et le domaine rural pendant l'époque mérovingienne, 1889; L'Invasion germanique et la Fin de l'Empire, 2nd ed., 1891; Les Origines du système féodal, le bénéfice et le patronat, revised and completed from the MSS. of the author by Cam. Julian, 1890. Am. Gasquet, L'Empire byzantin et la monarchie franque, 1888. G. Goyau, Hist. religieuse, from Hist. de la Nation française, edited by Gab. Hanotaux, Vol. IV. Guérard (Benjamin), Prolegomène au Polyptique de l'abbé Irminon, 1844. Imbart de la Tour, Histoire politique des Origines à 1515, from Hist. de la Nation française, edited by Gabr. Hanotaux, Vol. III. Junghans, Hist. de Childebert et de Chlodoveeh, translated by Monod, 1879. Kurth (Godef), Clavis, 2nd ed., 1901. Hist. poét. des Mérovingiens, 1893; Sainte Clotilde, 1897. Lenormande, Restitution d'un poème barbare relatif aux évènements du règne de

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Childebert Ier, from Bibl. de l'Ec. des Charis, 1839-40. Levillain, Le Baptême de Clovis, from Bibl. de l'Ec. de Charles, 1906. Latre, Étude sur les Barbares et le Moyen Âge, 1867. Longnon (Auguste), Géographie de la Gaule au IVème siècle, 1878; Origine et formation de la nationalité française. Maury (Alf.), Les Forêts de la Gaule, 1867. Meillet, Trad. à l'étude comparative des langues indo-européennes, 3rd ed., 1912. Pertz, Die Geschichte der Merowingischen Hausmeier, 1819. [Maxime Petit], Histoire de France illustrée. Picavet (François), La Littérature française en langue latine, from Hist. de la Nation française, edited by Gabr. Hanotaux, Vol. XII [1922]. Prou (Maurice), La Gaule Mérovingienne. Waitz, Ueber die Anfänge der Vassalität, 1856.

CHAPTER V

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The founders of the Carlovingian family, Saint Arnulf and Saint Pepin de Landen. Gallo-Roman ancestors. Charles Martel. His military valour. Victory of Poitiers (October 17, 732). Causes of the final retreat of the Arabs. The policy of Charles Martel towards the clergy. Childebrand. The benefices. Pepin the Short and Carloman. Retreat of Carloman to Monte Cassino. Alliance between the Papacy and the French Monarchy. Pepin has himself proclaimed King (751). Stephen II places himself and the Church of Rome under the rule of the King of France. Pepin's campaign in Italy. The Exarchate of Ravenna. Wars in Aquitaine. Duke Waifar. Early wars of Charlemagne. Partition of the kingdom of the Franks between the two sons of Pepin the Short, Charlemagne and Carloman. Charlemagne. Death of Carloman. Charlemagne seizes his heritage. The policy of Big-footed Bertha. Charlemagne breaks off relations with the King of the Lombards. Campaign in Italy. The General Assemblies under the Carlovingians. The Saxon Wars, Wittekind. Ecclesiastical nature of the government of Charlemagne. Dukes, Counts and Marquises. Capitularies and missi. Louis the Pious King of Aquitaine. Spanish campaigns. The disaster of Roncevaux (August 15, 788). Rolando, Duke of the Breton Marches. Campaign against the Huns. Appearance of the Normans. Charlemagne, Emperor of the West (December 25, 800). The Empress Irene. The Imperial Palace at Aix-la-Chapelle. The Court. Portrait of Charlemagne. End of his reign. Charlemagne loses his eldest sons. His lassitude. Death of the Emperor (January 28, 814). Reign of Louis the Pious. His struggles with his sons. Judith of Bavaria. Partition of the Empire. The higher clergy against the Emperor. Pitiful end of Louis the Pious. Charles the Bald. His alliance with his brother Louis II, the German Emperor. Battle of Fontenay. The oaths of Strasbourg (841). Partition of Verdun (843). The Normans arrive in Paris (845). Edict of Quierzy-sur-Oise (877). Charles the Bald, Emperor of the West. His death (877). Last days of the Carlovingian dynasty. Norman, Hungarian and Saracen invasions. Charles the Fat, King of France. Anarchy.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Abbot Hugh. A national dynasty. Conclusion.

CHARLEMAGNE, who was King of the French from 768 to 814, was the son of Pepin the Short.

Pepin the Short, so-called on account of his small stature, was the son of Charles Martel, who was the son of Pepin d'Heristal. The latter derived his name from the locality of Heristal, on the Meuse, between Liège and Maestricht, where he had built a palace for himself in which he frequently resided.

The father of Pepin d'Heristal was called Ansegis and his mother Begga. The latter was canonised. Ansegis was the son of Saint Arnulf, Mayor of the Palace in Austrasia and afterwards Bishop of Metz, who was married and the father of a family before his entry into the Church. Begga was the daughter of the first Pepin, called Pepin de Landen or Old Pepin, who was also numbered among the saints, and a young woman of Aquitaine, of senatorial rank, who brought her husband large domains as her dowry. Saint Arnulf and Saint Pepin de Landen had been appointed by Clotar II tutors of his son Dagobert. They formed the trunk of the Carlovingian family to which Charlemagne gave its name. Saint Pepin de Landen succeeded Saint Arnulf as Mayor of the Palace in Austrasia.

According to a tradition accepted at the Court of Charlemagne, Saint Arnulf, who had been appointed Bishop of Metz by royal favour, was descended from the family of Ferreolus, one of the great houses of the most Romanised province of Gaul—the Narbonnaise. His father, Ansbert, who was of senatorial rank, had married Blithilda, one of the daughters of Clotar I. We have already observed that Saint Begga, the mother of Pepin d'Heristal, was the daughter of a Gallo-Roman. Thus the family into which Charlemagne was to be born had as much Roman and Gallo-Roman as German blood in its veins; but since the immediate ancestors of the restorer of the Western Empire were Mayors of the Palace in Austrasia, and Austrasia, through its ever-increasing hostility to Neustria, had implanted its German character, Charlemagne had come to use the German language in private life. His education, moreover, had been very much neglected; he did not even know how to write.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

At the end of the seventh century the Carlovingian family possessed vast domains and was distinguished on account of the important offices, and particularly that of Mayor of the Palace, held by several of its members, and the number of faithful retainers it has thus succeeded in attaching to it.

Finally, the Carlovingian family shone out among the rest on account of the number of saints it had produced—nine Bishops, seven saints, of whom the first was Pepin de Landen, and three female saints, of whom one, Tarsilia, had raised a man from the dead. “Your family is holy”—sancta gens—wrote Pope Stephen III to Charlemagne and Carloman in the year 769.

In addition to this the heads of the family were successively men of the greatest valour—Pepin de Landen, Pepin d’Heristal, Charles Martel and Pepin the Short. Resounding victories, one of which saved Christendom, served to heighten its glory.

After the death of Dagobert II, King of Austrasia, Pepin d’Heristal, with the help of his brother Duke Martin, seized the government of that kingdom (680). Thierry III, King of Neustria, and Ebroin, his rough and violent Mayor of the Palace, marched out against them and defeated them; but the war was renewed a few years later. The Austrasian leudes wanted a government of their own. Thierry III and his Mayor, Berthar, suffered a decisive defeat at Tertry, between Péronne and Saint Quentin (687). Pepin d’Heristal had Berthar put to death, after which, says the continuator of Fredegar, “he seized the person of the King, the royal Treasury and the office of Mayor of the Palace.”

In all these struggles, the interests of the King were not at issue. Thierry was the reputed King of Austrasia, as well as of Neustria and Aquitaine. And he continued to be so regarded. The Austrasian leudes, however, fought for a Mayor of their own against the Neustrians who wished to impose theirs upon them, and at this time the latter were in power.

Pepin d’Heristal, say the chroniclers, governed the kingdom of France for twenty-seven years, and his rule seems to have been both firm and skilful. The designation of Mayor of the Palace was no longer sufficient for him, and he conferred upon himself that of Duke of the Franks. Foreign sovereigns sought his alliance and exchanged ambassadors with him. The office of Mayor of the Palace had attained such a high degree of power that royalty seemed to be completely overshadowed by it.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Pepin d'Heristal carried on his government with three aims in view, all of which had but one object—the increase of his power.

He tried to abolish the division between the kingdoms of Neustria and Austrasia by giving them a common King, Clovis III., the son of Thierry, in 691, Childebert III., the second son of Thierry, in 695, and lastly, Dagobert III., the son of Childebert, in 711.

Secondly, whilst allowing these princes to remain titular monarchs, he did not permit them to take the smallest share in the government, even for the sake of appearances, and, lastly, at the beginning of each new reign, he saw to it that the dead King should be succeeded by the prince whose rights to the throne were the most obvious, so that no loophole could be left for discussion, thus reducing the influence of the Great Ones who used to meet together when a new King had to be appointed. The proposal made by Pepin d'Heristal was such that it could not fail to be carried by acclamation.

It was Pepin d'Heristal who had all the posts, offices and honours, including the appointment of Bishops and Abbots, in his gift, and disposed at his pleasure of whatever remained over from the taxes, as well as from the produce of the royal villas. On his death, in 714, his heirs were his grandsons, children who were actually appointed to the government under the tutelage of their grandmother Pletruda; but the Neustrians were quick to revolt and appoint Ragenfred their Mayor, whilst the Austrasians also rebelled and chose a natural son of Pepin d'Heristal, an energetic soldier whom history has glorified by the name of Charles Martel, so roughly did he hammer his enemies in battle. His mother was called Alpaida. Charles Martel, Mayor of Austrasia, in his turn imposed his authority upon the Neustrians and became, in fact, King of France. Thus the Carlovingian family grew slowly but surely ever greater, strengthening its power and authority from one generation to the next, by the extension of its domains, which had become the largest in Gaul, by increasing its riches, by holding the highest offices and multiplying its "faithful retainers," by the holiness of a large number of its members and the miracles they worked, and lastly by the personal valour of the leaders who guided its destinies.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Thus the family descended from Pepin de Landen and Saint Arnulf found themselves at the head of the Austrasian aristocracy and, by this fact alone, at the head of the State. The King no longer exercised any authority over his own lands, but only over persons. Thanks to the system of recommendation and patronage, this power over individuals had become clearly defined, but the King's faithful retainers, the leudes, and the antrustions had in their turn, by means of recommendation and patronage, secured retainers who were personally attached to them and had thus also increased their power. Society was becoming co-ordinated. Every large landed proprietor, outside the State, reorganised it on his own lands, from which the right of immunity had ousted the agents of the King. On their vast domains several hundreds of Bishops, Abbots and overlords, rich in lands and men, exercised sovereign rights and raised taxes. At the apex of this aristocracy arranged in groups and orders of rank there shone resplendent the Carlovingian family. The crowned King was King, but without power of any sort.

On the death of Pepin d'Heristal, Charles Martel was in the fortress of Cologne where Plectruda, his father's widow, had Charles Martel. had him incarcerated. He was rescued by the Austrasian leudes, and at their head he defeated the Frisians, who had invaded Austrasia, and afterwards the Neustrians, under the leadership of their Mayor, Ragenfred, at Vincy-les-Cambrai (717). He renewed his campaigns against the Frisians, whom he defeated on the coast; against the Saxons, whom he challenged five times; against the Bavarians; against the Alemanni, whom he defeated twice, and against the Neustrians and the Aquitanians. He displayed an unbridled activity, swift to discover and destroy any plots formed against him. In Aquitaine, Duke Eudo still kept his power, but the advance of the conquering Saracens obliged him also to appeal to the Duke of Austrasia.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Ever since the beginning of the eighth century Christian Europe had been exposed to a terrible menace. In 711 the African Arabs had invaded Spain and made themselves masters there. In 720 they crossed the Pyrenees, penetrated into Septimania and took Narbonne. In 721 Toulouse was threatened. Eudo, Duke of Aquitaine, succeeded in holding them in check for a time, but after the fall of Nimes and Carcassonne and the sack of Autun (725) the danger became deadly.

Eudo implored the help of Charles Martel.

The great victory which the valiant Mayor of Austrasia won near Poitiers over the Mussulman troops under the command of Abd-er-Rhaman, a hundred years after the death of Mahomet, saved Christian Europe (October 17, 732). By an extraordinary coincidence this defeat suffered by the Arabs took place at the very moment when the Berbers of north Africa in Maghreb rose in a general rebellion which threatened their rule in countries which were essential to them for their invasions into Europe; and the Saracens, obliged to use their forces on the African continent, were forced to abandon their grandiose dreams of conquest. For the struggle in Maghreb, fed by religious dissensions in the bosom of peoples who had been converted by force, raged for many a long year. The Saracens appeared again as marauders, but their great conquering onslaught had been ended at least in western Europe.

Campaigns followed in Burgundy (733), in Aquitaine (733), in Provence (739), by means of which Charles Martel secured his rule over Gaul. Therry IV, surnamed Therry de Chelles, died in 737, and Charles Martel dispensed with consulting the assembly qualified to acclaim the new King, contenting himself with leaving the throne empty. The remainder of his rule was regarded by the royal notaries as a sort of interregnum. They dated their acts in such and such a year after the death of Therry IV and thus established their chronology.

Again when Eudo, Duke of Aquitaine, had been re-established in his States by the conqueror of Poitiers, the latter left him independence, and when, subsequently, he, in conjunction with

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Hunald, the son of Duke Eudo (who died in 735), passed an edict deelaring him, Charles Martel, suzerain of Aquitaine, he did not aet as King of France, but Hunald deelared that he held his States in fealty and homage to Charles personally and his two sons Carloman and Pepin. The latter was destined to become the real founder of the dynasty.

The Arabs, after their retreat in 732, had remained masters of Septimania, whence they eontinued to molest Aquitaine. But several of the more powerful overlords in that country, and even counts, impatient of the Frankish domination, supported their manœuvres. In 735, the Saraeens seized Arles and Avignon, whence they made incursions as far as Burgundy (736). “The Duke Charles,” writes the continuator of Fredegar, “having raiscd an army, marched towards Burgundy, subjected to his power the town of Lyons, together with the lords and prefects of that province, appointed judges as far as Marseilles and Arles, and returned laden with booty to the capital of his Empire.”

There was a fresh eampaign in 737. The Saraeens had returned and captured Avignon. Charles Martel advanced as far as Narbonne. The Emir of Cordova sent help for the besieged town from Spain. But Charles Martel, once again victorious, had a great massacre of Saraeens and completely destroyed Nîmes, Agde and Béziers, and ruined a number of castles and strongholds, after which he returned to his northern provinces.

In 741, the year of his death, Charles reeeived ambassadors from Gregory III, who sent him the keys of St. Peter’s tomb and begged him to come to his help against the Lombards of Italy. Charles hesitated. The strength of the Lombards was not known to him, and he was afraid of another offensive on the part of the Arabs.

Moreover, the present sent him by the Holy Father did not represent sovereignty over the city of Rome, as some historians have maintained. The keys were reproductions of the original, only valuable because they had been made by melting down part of the chains worn by Saint Peter. They formed a kind of decoration like the order of the Golden Fleeee, which the King of Spain bestows to this day. These keys were also worn hung round the neck. Over twenty persons, including several women, had been honoured in the same way.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Charles Martel thanked the Sovereign Pontiff for his good grace in sending to his Court the Abbot of Corbie and a monk from Saint Denis named Sigebert, laden with rich presents, but refused to commit himself.

We can already see the outlines of the policy the pontifical Court was afterwards to adopt.

Against the Emperor of Constantinople who, as the heir of the Roman Emperors, claimed the suzerainty over Italy, on the one hand, and on the other, against the Lombards established in the north of the peninsula and along the coasts, the Pope solicited the help of the Frankish princes. "The Sovereign Pontiff," writes the continuator of Fredegar, "and Duke Charles agreed by treaty that the Roman people should abandon the cause of the Emperor and that the Pope should appoint Prince Charles consul of Rome."

Charles Martel, whose strong right arm had routed the Saracens, was a rough and magnificent warrior. Rome came to him as a suppliant, and he himself supported with his arms the missionaries he sent to Germany, but the main object he had in view was his own power and the glory of his sword, and his chief concern was to secure the means of triumph. In order to bind to him the leudes who formed the main strength of his armies, he gorged them with booty, and thus booty he took where he found it, in the vast domains of the clergy. Bishoprics and abbeys were plundered by him. The Bishop of Vienne, in order to avoid witnessing the rising of his church, took refuge in the shelter of a monastery. Under Pepin the Short, the son of Charles Martel, forty one places were restored to the Abbey of Saint Denis which Charles Martel had taken from it, and their restitution seems to have been far from complete. But it is only fair to add that the Holy See itself, in order to allow Charles to carry on his campaigns against the Saracens, had placed the goods of the clergy at his disposal.

Charles, it is true, went even further. Not satisfied with dividing between his "faithful retainers" a large proportion of the treasures of the Church, he also appointed them to the bishoprics and abbeys. He made his nephew Hugh Bishop of Paris, Bayeux and Rouen at the same time, as well as Abbot of Saint Wandrille, Fleury-sur-Loire and Jumièges. Milon, his companion in arms, was promoted to both the archbishopries of Treves and Rheims at the same time. As may easily be imagined, many of these prelates had been very badly trained in the functions they were called upon to fulfil. Some of them did not know how to read. They were, moreover, indefatigable hunters and good soldiers, always ready to arms. Gerold, Bishop of Worms, died sword in hand against the Saxons, and his son inherited the episcopal throne as though it were an heirloom. These noble prelates, who made armed attacks upon the convents in their own or neighbouring provinces, took them by assault and plundered them as though they were conquered places, took but little interest in their flocks or their clergy, who were obliged to go in for trading in order to make a living. To win a bishopric it was deemed unnecessary to enter the Church, which was a mere waste of time; a Bishop had other things to do than to say Mass and wear the tonsure.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Thus Charles Martel, although he had saved them, was as much hated by members of the Church as he was loved by his own men-at-arms. Saint Boniface, Archbishop of Mayence, the apostle of Germany, declared to Carloman and Pepin that their father was most certainly damned. Pepin the Short was convinced of it. A few years after the death of Charles Martel, when his tomb was opened at Saint Denis, it was found that his body was not there. In its place was discovered a great serpent—others say a black dragon—which could only have been the devil. The monks of Saint Denis told this tale to all comers. In 858, more than a hundred years after the hero of Poitiers had left this world, the clergy used to assure Louis II of Germany, the grandson of the great soldier, that his great-grandfather was in hell because he had given the goods of the Church to the laity.

Charles Martel died on the 22nd of October, 741, at Quierzy-sur-Oise, after a reign of twenty-six years. He was always and everywhere a magnificent victor, and rendered possible the work of his successors, Pepin the Short and Charlemagne. With great sweeps of his sword he had opened up the way for their policy, though doubtless he knew not what he did. But giver in regard to the person, who by the very deed of gift became his vassal, and the duties of fealty, help and succour on the latter towards him who had become his overlord. The chief obligation of the beneficiary consisted of military service, and it was above all with the object of increasing their forces, by multiplying the number of their men at arms, that the Carlovingian princes distributed benefices. The policy of Charles Martel sheds a very clear light upon this point of view. Moreover, the concession of benefices was closely allied to recommendation; it was the complement of the latter. The bond between the overlord and the vassal could be established in two ways—the humbler person might come and place himself under the aegis of the more powerful by means of recommendation, as we have already described, or the more powerful could attach the humbler to him by means of a beneficiary concession which involved all the consequences of recommendation.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

All this obviously bore a very close resemblance to the feudalism of the ninth century; nevertheless the difference between the two institutions is very great. The feudal tie involved of necessity military service, whilst the beneficiary only imposed it in certain cases, which were, it is true, exceedingly numerous. But in other instances it was conceded in return for the payment of rent in money, or in work of various kinds. It might even be conceded as an act of grace with no tie except a moral obligation.

Should the beneficiary fail in his duties, the beneficiary was forfeited. The beneficiary had to look after the benefice conferred upon him, keep the lands in good order, and maintain the buildings in good repair. We find the princes forcing the holders of royal or ecclesiastical benefices to superintend the tenants of the domain, whether cultivators or serfs, and feed them in times of scarcity. One of the capitularies of Charlemagne stated that the possessor of a burnished coat of arms who did not carry it with him to war would be deprived both of it and of his benefice.

Although the benefice was essentially a life-interest, it more and more frequently became hereditary owing to the general conditions of the epoch. In the first place it seemed only natural to keep the son in his father's benefice, and later the transmission took place as a matter of course. The ideas of the age as well as the force of circumstances gradually led to the hereditary principle being regarded more and more as a right. The beneficiary came to consider the title he held as his own property, which, under certain conditions, he was allowed to cede to a third party. The holder of an important domain would give away a portion of it to another beneficiary, who would hold it from him under similar conditions to those which bound the original beneficiary to his overlord. Others aimed at converting their benefices into their own private property, into independent allodia. The princes had a hard task to combat this tendency. "Let him who holds a benefice from the Emperor or the Church," said Charlemagne, "take nothing therēfrom into his own patrimony." An ingenious process consisted in transferring to others a benefice held from the sovereign, only to buy it back again for ready money and hold the domain as an allodium, that is to say under an independent title.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Benjamin Guérard points out in a capitulary of 757, not only the word beneficium, but the words seigneur and vassal, bearing their historical signification. As for the word "fief," feodum, that was not found until the eleventh century to designate an institution very similar to the benefice, but having no direct connection with it.

A benefice given to a man at his own request and for a definitely limited period was called precarious. It applied to little except Church property and did not involve military service.

On the death of Charles Martel, his two sons, Carloman and Pepin, divided Gaul between them, Carloman taking Austrasia and Pepin Neustria and Burgundy. They both assumed the title of Mayor of the Palace.

We have already seen how Charles Martel had seized the sovereignty of Burgundy, Neustria and Austrasia, at the expense of his nephews, the sons of Pepin d'Heristal. And now we find Theudoald, one of the latter, claiming his share, which consisted of nothing less than Neustria and Burgundy. His pretensions were settled by having him assassinated.

In the following year, on the 2nd of April, 742, in a place in Neustria which has remained unknown, historians are generally agreed that the child who was destined to become Charlemagne was born. His father was Pepin the Short and his mother Big-footed Bertha, the daughter of Caribert, Count of Laon.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Nevertheless it was necessary to have a King. The presence of an undisputed chief, of a keystone to the social arch, was a necessity. And this supreme head required to be invested with a moral character which placed him above all rival competitors, aspirants and factions. The proclamation of either Carloman or Pepin as King would immediately have given rise to divisions and conflicting claims; one great lord or another would have risen up in arms, supported by his partisans, and an era of violent struggles would have been inaugurated of which no one would have been able to foresee the development or the end.

Carloman and Pepin, therefore, set to work to find a prince to wear the crown, and finally succeeded in unearthing from the depths of a quiet abbey a Merovingian of doubtful lineage whom they set upon the throne with the title of Childeric III (743). Like his immediate predecessors, Childeric was King only in name. The interregnum since the death of Thierry de Chelles had lasted six years.

The two brothers, Carloman and Pepin, got on extraordinarily well together. Between them they conducted a campaign against the Aquitanians who had rebelled under the leadership of their Duke Hunald, the son of Duke Eudo. It was the usual warfare of the period, consisting of pillage and devastation. Bourges was sacked and the two brothers returned laden with much booty and followed by a number of prisoners.

In 744 Carloman conducted a campaign against the Saxons, who, in the course of repeated incursions, had pillaged Austrasia. He and his brother Pepin, moreover, carried on the policy of their father, endeavouring to render the barbarian people innocuous, not only by inspiring them with terror of the Frankish armies, but by drawing them to the faith and practice of the Christian Church by means of missions. The two princes drew ever closer and closer to the Church. The great problem of the secularisations practised by Charles Martel for the benefit of his warriors, and which Carloman and Pepin had also indulged in during the first years of their reign, remained in abeyance. Several Councils, and especially the Council of Solomons (744), offered the following solution—ecclesiastical property and domains, which had been alienated for the benefit of the laity, were to remain the property of the latter, but only in usufruct; and the clergy thus despoiled were to remain the possessors of the property, at the expense of the armed forces on behalf of the “beneficiaries” and in receipt of rent calculated to a fraction. It was the clergy who had the best of the bargain. At the same time the organisation of the bishoprics was reformed under the direction of the two princes. In each episcopal see a Chapter of Canons was established with rules framed on the pattern of those in monastic institutions.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The accord between Pepin and Carloman afforded a spectacle rare indeed for hundreds of years in the relationship of two brothers; when suddenly Carloman declared that he wished to renounce the pomps of the world and retired into a monastery.

“Inflamed by a holy love of piety,” we read in the continuator of Fredegar, “Carloman placed his kingdom, together with his children and his son Drogo, in the hands of his brother Pepin, and went to Rome, where he entered the Church of the Holy Apostles and took his place in the ranks of the monks. By means of this succession the power of Pepin was more firmly established.”

This “succession” was also settled after the manner of Clovis. The worthy French historians of the eighteenth century pointed out, in connection with this entrusting of the children of Carloman to the hands of Pepin the Short, “It was like giving sheep to the wolf to guard.” What happened to the unfortunate little things? Let us hope that they were not murdered, like Theudoald, who took the extraordinary step of laying claim to his share of his grandfather’s heritage. However that may be, nothing more is heard of them.

There has been much discussion as to the motives leading Carloman to assume the monk’s cowl. Was it because, like Charles V later on, he was disgusted with the pomps and vanities of the world?

Gaillard, in the eighteenth century, speaks as follows:

“Carloman, persuaded on the faith of the clergy that his father, Charles Martel, was damned, tormented by the idea and disgusted with his age, went and buried himself in a cloister, either because this allowed him still to hope that his repentance might make up for his father's failure in that respect, or because the terrible picture of a father devoured by eternal torture made him fear the dangers of earthly glory for himself."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Kleinlausz cites the remorse with which Carloman was devoured for a terrible massacre of Alcinanni he had ordered in 745 to account for it; or thought that perhaps it was due to the great need for a life of peaceful contemplation felt in that rude age by so many souls who had been drawn into the whirlpool of the world. Perhaps too the sacrifice of Thudoald, in which Pepin had made him share, filled Carloman with horror for the demands made upon a sovereign. At all events, from the day on which Pope Zacharias imposed the tonsure upon him, the noble prince became an edifying example to all with whom he came in contact. He first of all went to a monastery (to-day the Cloister of Saint Sylvester) which he had built on Monte Soracte, in Etruria, fifty miles from Rome (748), but since his personality attracted too many visitors to it he fled to the wilds of Monte Cassino, where he confined himself to the commonest of tasks, which he carried out in all simplicity and a humility he tried not to make too apparent.

There remained to carry on the government Pepin the Short and his puppet King.

Pepin was short of stature but extraordinarily robust, and the chroniclers have handed us down epic tales about him. His was a nature full of fire and audacity, and the energy of his resolutions and the rapidity with which he carried them out were reminiscent of his father, Charles Martel.

He was thirty-seven years old. Divested of all family ties he breathed freely. In diplomas he had himself described as "he to whom the Saviour has confided the cares of government," and he thought the moment had at last come when, by means suggested to him by his devilry, he might approach the great task before which his father and grandfather had recoiled.

In 751 Pepin sent to Pope Zacharias the famous embassy consisting of Fulrad, Abbot of Saint Denis, and Bonhard, Bishop of Wurzburg, in order to consult the Sovereign Pontiff on the subject of the King who ruled France without authority.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Zacharias apparently replied, "It is better to call him King who wields the power than him who is deprived of it."

This reply on the part of the Sovereign Pontiff has been universally applauded. But perhaps we may be allowed to express our opinion regarding it. If it is authentic, it was an outrage, more especially on the lips of the Head of the Church, the heir of the doctrine of Christ and charged with the duty of carrying it out in peace, mildness and loving kindness.

What was to become of the great maxim : "Rend^r unto Cæsar . . ." if the astounding theory ascribed to Zacharias was to prevail ? What was to become of justice ?

Might is right, said old La Fontaine sadly, whilst the Sovereign Pontiff proclaimed it as a principle of equity.

That Pepin, by an act of authority, and supported by the nobility of the kingdom, in one of their assemblies of March or May, should have had himself proclaimed King would have been an act of usurpation, but an act before which history would have been forced to bow; but against an act of spoliation cunningly carried out in complicity with the Holy See it is the duty of every honest man to rise up in incignant protest.

To the credit of Pope Zacharias and of the Holy See, which has played so great and glorious a part in history, the authenticity of the famous reply to Pepin is very far from having been established. Modern historians accept it, but it is not to be found in the most ancient annals of France. There is no trace of it in the life of Zacharias by the librarian Anastasius, nor in that of Saint Boniface, who consecrated Pepin King of France, a life written by his disciple Willibad of Eichstädt. The Pope does not mention it in his correspondence with Pepin and with Saint Boniface; and finally, as the historian Gaillard so justly observes, it would be astonishing if, in a matter of such great importance, only a verbal reply was given and was regarded as sufficient.

It is more likely that it was a rumour cleverly circulated by Pepin himself to make his usurpation more acceptable, and repeated by Eginhard. The matter was not carried through without an effort. When the designs of the Mayor of the Palace became evident, protestations were raised and troubles broke out. The alleged declaration of Pope Zacharias served to allay them, and Pepin gained thereby all he lacked to enable him to lay hands on the crown—moral support of a singularly strong nature in those days when men's minds were dominated by a faith so lively that we can only with the greatest difficulty form the vaguest idea of it.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The poor little Merovingian King had in his favour his long hair, which was still venerated by the Franks, but which was soon to be shorn; he had the lays celebrating his heroism and his ancestors, but which were soon to be replaced by lays infinitely more beautiful in favour of the Carlovingians; on the other hand, Pepin had power and the alleged approval of the representative of God on earth.

In 751 Pepin convoked a General Assembly of the Great Ones at Soissons and succeeded in having himself proclaimed King and his wife Bertha saluted as Queen. Childeric III received the tonsure and was returned to the monastic life from which he had been so cruelly torn. The place of residence chosen for him was the monastery of Saint Bertin. His son, Thierry, was imprisoned at Saint Wandrille.

The election at Soissons was confirmed by a religious consecration—anointing at the hands of the Roman Pontiff or his representative.

The anointing of a King was a novelty, at least in France, for it was practised in Spain and among the Anglo-Saxons and Bretons. Under the Merovingians the coronation had been an exclusively military ceremony; Pepin added that religious element which had the result of placing him in the minds of his contemporaries far above the princes whose place he was taking. He himself declared that he was the elect of God and that he ruled by right divine; but in despoiling the Merovingians he took care not to mention the holy unction brought from heaven by a dove at the baptism of Clovis.

Pepin was crowned King of France in the town of Soissons by Saint Boniface, the Legate of the Holy See, apostle of Germany and Archbishop of Cologne. The royal prerogative of being crowned in the archiepiscopal see of Rheims, dates only from the twelfth century. Pepin had himself anointed together with his wife, Big-looted Bertha, which was in itself an innovation and also a clever device. For the sons born of their union were forthwith designated heirs to the throne.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The coronation of the King by Saint Boniface (752) was repeated two years later—the 28th of July, 754—in the basilica of Saint Denis by Pope Stephen II, who had come to France. Not only did the Sovereign Pontiff confirm the consecration made in his name by the Archbishop of Cologne, but he went much further by hurling an edict of excommunication against any who, in the course of time, might dare to elect a King from any other race than that upon whose usurpation he was bestowing his blessing: Ut nunquam de alterius lumbis regem in ævo presumant eligere; let no man in the future, said the Pope, dare to chose a King from outside this family “ which has been raised by divine piety and consecrated by the intercession of the Holy Apostles.”

When Hugh Capet, with the concurrence of the higher clergy of France, took away the crown from the Carlovingian Charles of Lorraine, did he regard himself as excommunicated together with the distinguished prelates who crowned him on his election?

After having consecrated him King of France, Stephen II further proclaimed Pepin a “ Patrician of the Romans.” This was a title to which, even in the time of Clovis, great importance was attached and which was regarded as superior to that of King. The patrician was the delegate of the Emperor in the countries in which he was established. Since then the patriciate had become an honorary dignity. And thus it came about that all the exarchates who administered Italy as lieutenants of the Emperor were patricians. It is only right to add that the Sovereign Pontiff had not the smallest authority for conferring any such dignity. He had the power of appointing Cardinals, Legates, Bishops and Abbots; in all that concerned the patriciate, the Byzantine Empire alone might have had a right to intervene; but after all, what did one usurpation more or less matter!

Stephen II made not only Pepin but also his two sons “ patricians.”

It must be confessed that these numerous favours and generosity were very far from being disinterested. If we may use a colloquial expression, it was not for love that Stephen II

THE EARLIEST TIMES

"Here lies Saint Carloman, King and monk of Monte Cassino,—the cell surrounded him with a halo more brilliant than did the throne, the cowl than the purple, the daily service than the sceptre, submission than power. . . ."

Several historians have accused Pepin the Short of having rid himself of his brother in the same way as he had of his nephew Theudoald, and his conduct affords only too great a justification of their suspicions.

However that may be, when once he was free from his inconvenient relative, King Pepin was able to carry out his plan with a free hand. He did not succeed in overcoming the hostility of the nobles towards the Italian war; the impression made by Carloman remained indelible; but he was clever at managing men, at seducing them by benefits conferred and by promises, at conjuring up dazzling visions before their eyes, and, if necessary, at moving them by threats. After further hesitation, protestation and disorders, he at last succeeded in going to war. He crossed the Alps at the head of a powerful army, defeated the Lombards and received the famous exarchate of Ravenna together with the Pentapolis on the coast of the Adriatic, which included the towns of Ravenna, Rimini, Pesaro, Fano, Cesane, Sinigaglia, Aneona, Jesi, Forli, Urbino, Cagli, Gubbio and Narni, which the King of the Franks presented to the Sovereign Pontiff, thus creating the temporal power of the Papacy (755).

As a matter of fact, the exarchate was not actually wrested from the Lombards, but from the Byzantine Emperor, who was its suzerain. But Byzantium was a long way off; she did not enforce her rights and the matter was not closely investigated.

The expedition into Italy was repeated in 756, after fresh efforts on the part of Pepin to overcome the hostility of his leudes. The gift of the exarchate was solemnly confirmed.

Paul III, the brother and successor of Stephen II, continued the policy of union with the King of the Franks. He sent Pepin choristers to teach the choir of the royal chapel; he sent him rare books and beautiful manuscripts; for Pepin, who had been educated at Saint Denis, had a taste for literature; he made him a present of a clock, which the old chroniclers called a "night clock," because it told the time by night and not only during the day, like the sundials which were the only timepieces then known in France.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

In the reign of Pepin the government took a decided step in the direction of the ecclesiastical monarchy finally realised by Charlemagne. The capitularies had formulated the canons of the Church and had given them the force of law. If called upon to do so, the Counts and other representatives of royal authority were bound to give armed support to the ecclesiastical judges. A private individual, whose crimes had become notorious, was tracked down and punished by the secular arm of the law, which also had the right of inflicting capital punishment.

The advent of the vigorous Carolingian dynasty changed the very character of royalty. To all appearances the political constitution remained the same as it had been under the last of the Merovingians, with the exception that the hereditary principle was applied to the benefices as well as to offices and served as a weapon of power in the hands of the great princes who guided the country's destiny—Pepin d'Heristal, Charles Martel, Pepin the Short and Charlemagne. The Kings were no longer children held in tutelage or unfortunate wretches under indictment, but intelligent, active and energetic chieftains, endowed with a valour that made them popular, and the prestige of whose victories, together with the sacred halo bestowed upon their family by the pontifical unction, raised them above the heads of other men. They conceived great designs and knew how to carry them into action. Benjamin Guérard sums up the situation in one brief sentence pregnant with truth—"The Merovingians had taken Gaul away from the Romans, it was now a question of taking it away from the leaders of factions."

These leaders had been glutted by Charles Martel with the property of the clergy, after which he had subjected them to a certain discipline; Pepin the Short drowned them in floods of pontifical unction and diplomacy; Charlemagne encased them in ecclesiastical cement out of which they were unable to stir, though this task of clerical administration carried out by the clumsy hands of great warriors, beginning with Charles Martel, met with vigorous resistance. It is impossible to describe the whole process, but we can at least cast a glance on the epic campaigns of Pepin in Aquitaine.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Here he found a magnificent adversary in the person of Duke Waifar, the son and successor (745) of Duke Hunald, with whom Charles Martel had concluded a treaty of fealty and homage. In 751 Waifar granted asylum to Gripon, Pepin's brother, whom the latter had despoiled. War broke out and lasted for seventeen years. Terrific struggles took place of which we are given a picture in an admirable poem entitled Garin le Loherain. It is an epic of the twelfth century, but in its brutal savagery reproduces the spirit of a much older work.

It was in these campaigns that Charlemagne had his first lessons in the art of war under the guidance of his father (761). We can form some idea of these expeditions from the description given of the year 763 by the continuator of Fredegar:

"In 763, having convoked all the Frankish warriors, Pepin went to Nevers, where he held a council of war with all his nobles. Whereupon he crossed the Loire and laid waste Aquitaine as far as Limoges and above all set fire to Waifar's domains. In many monasteries he drove out all the inmates. After this he immediately marched upon Issoudun and took the town, and afterwards ravaged the vine-bearing cantons of Aquitaine from which the monasteries, the churches and the poor, as well as the rich, procured their wine. Waifar raised a large army composed chiefly of Gascons and Basques; but the Gascons took flight and were massacred." The Franks went home laden with booty. In the following year the same process was repeated.

Waifar waged this war for the independence of his country as Vercingetorix had done before him, and himself laid bare what territories in order to deprive the enemy of the means of subsistence. He retired into the mountainous parts of Dordogne and afterwards into the strongholds of Auvergne, where the spirit of the great Gaul still hovered and where it was impossible to reach him. At last Pepin brought the war to an end by having his indomitable adversary assassinated by hired ruffians in the forest of Ver in Perigord (June 2, 769).

And Pepin, says his chronicler, "returned in great triumph to Saintes, where his Queen Bertha had remained."

Thus Pepin brought Aquitaine under his rule, with the exception of the Duchy of Gascony, which he was obliged to leave in the hands of Waifar's son. . The latter nursed in his heart a ferocious hatred for the Franks of which he subsequently gave striking proofs.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Pepin did not long survive his enemy. He was already ill when he left Aquitaine to return northwards. On his arrival at Saint Denis he convoked an assembly of the chief personages in the Palace and in their presence divided his kingdom between his two sons. The elder, Charles, the future Charlemagne, was given Austrasia and the portion of Neustria situated north of the Oise and Aquitaine with the exception of the ecclesiastical province of Bourges; the younger, Carloman, had Thuringia, Hesse, Alemmania, Alsace, Septimania and that part of Aquitaine which had not been given to his brother. Pepin also left a daughter, Giselle, who received the Abbey of Chelles.

Pepin the Short gave up the ghost on the 24th of September, 768, at the age of fifty-seven, after a long reign, which decided the fate of his dynasty together with that of France and of the Papacy.

"Pepin wished to be buried at the door of the church of Saint Denis, with his face to the ground, the position of penitents, to expiate—what?" asks the historian Gaillard. Doubtless the death of Theudoald, of Carloman and his sons, of Grippon, of Remistain, and Waifar?—"Not at all," says Abbé Suger, "but to expiate the usurpations by Charles Martel, his father, of the property of the Church. This was the infamous crime which filled men with terror even five hundred years later, and then more than ever. . . ."

The two sons of Pepin the Short were placed on their thrones a fortnight after the death of their father—Charles, whom we shall now call by his historic name of Charlemagne, at Noyon, and Carloman at Soissons. Each of the two princes took possession of that part of their father's kingdom which had been allotted to him. Charlemagne was twenty-six and Carloman seventeen.

The government of the two brothers was carried on far from smoothly, and was constantly interrupted by struggles, quarrels and disagreements. They got on as badly together as Carloman and Pepin, the sons of Charles Martel, had

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Here he found a magnificent adversary in the person of Duke Waifar, the son and successor (715) of Duke Hunald, with whom Charles Martel had concluded a treaty of fealty and homage. In 751 Waifar granted asylum to Gripon, Pepin's brother, whom the latter had despoiled. War broke out and lasted for seventeen years. Terrific struggles took place of which we are given a picture in an admirable poem entitled Garin le Lohraine. It is an epic of the twelfth century, but in its brutal savagery reproduces the spirit of a much older work.

It was in these campaigns that Charlemagne had his first lessons in the art of war under the guidance of his father (761). We can form some idea of these expeditions from the description given of the year 763 by the continuator of Fredegar :

"In 763, having convoked all the Frankish warriors, Pepin went to Nevers, where he held a council of war with all his nobles. Whereupon he crossed the Loire and laid waste Aquitaine as far as Limoges and above all set fire to Waifar's domains. In many monasteries he drove out all the inmates. After this he immediately marched upon Issoudun and took the town, and afterwards ravaged the vine-bearing cantons of Aquitaine from which the monasteries, the churches and the poor, as well as the rich, procured their wine. Waifar raised a large army composed chiefly of Gascons and Basques; but the Gascons took flight and were massacred." The Franks went home laden with booty. In the following year the same process was repeated.

Waifar waged this war for the independence of his country as Vercingetorix had done before him, and himself laid bare whole territories in order to deprive the enemy of the means of subsistence. He retired into the mountainous parts of Dordogne, and afterwards into the strongholds of Auvergne, where the spirit of the great Gaul still hovered and where it was impossible to reach him. At last Pepin brought the war to an end by having his indomitable adversary assassinated by hired ruffians in the forest of Ver in Perigord (June 2, 768).

And Pepin, says his chronicler, "returned in great triumph to Saintes, where his Queen Bertha had remained."

Thus Pepin brought Aquitaine under his rule, with the exception of the Duchy of Gascony, which he was obliged to forbade him to take a wife outside his own country. Unlike the women of France, who were so charming, the Lombards were repulsive and smelt bad. Moreover, how could the Lombards, a people who had brought leprosy into Italy, be allowed a place in the human race? Furthermore, was not Charlemagne already married to Himiltruda, by whom he had a son? The bonds of matrimony were indissoluble. "Do not forget," wrote Stephen III to Charlemagne, "that my predecessor prevented King Pepin from repudiating your own mother!" The Pope concluded by hurling the thunders of the Church against whomsoever dared to mention such a project again, condemning him to everlasting fire stoked by the devil, whereas, if he showed himself obedient to the voice of the Pontiff, Charlemagne would be rewarded with eternal joy in the presence of the saints and all the elect of Paradise.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Neither Charlemagne nor Big-footed Bertha allowed themselves to be convinced by the pontifical arguments. Charlemagne repudiated his young wife, Himiltruda, and the son she had borne him—the latter we shall hear of again as Pepin the Hunchback—and married Desideria, the daughter of the King of the Lombards.

The year 770 is notable for the Aquitainian campaign. On hearing of the death of Pepin, Duke Hunald thought a favourable opportunity had arrived for renewing the war of independence. He left the cloister, and the whole of Aquitaine rose up in arms. It was in Aquitaine that Charlemagne had served his apprenticeship in arms, and he reappeared at the head of an imposing army. From the first day he proved himself to be the intelligent and resolute soldier, with a marvellous gift for organisation, who was destined to fill the world with wonder. He did not possess much originality in his military designs, nor were they conspicuous for any very great hardihood or ingenuity. His campaigns were monotonous and wearisome, but were remarkable for their rapidity of movement—in this respect Charlemagne was superior to Charles Martel—and above all for their wonderful organisation—mobilisation, commissariat and supplies—which were astonishing for that epoch. Moreover, Charlemagne was everywhere triumphant, and as in the art of war the aim is victory, he must take his place among the great soldiers of the world.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

agreed well. Their father had hoped to bind them together by giving them joint control in Aquitaine; but the result was exactly the opposite. And if we turn to what we to day call foreign pobjey, the discord was no less virulent, Charlemagne supporting the aspirations of the Court of Rome and Carloman those of the King of Lombardy.

Big-footed Bertha, the mother of the two young men, did her best to keep them friendly. She was a woman of great force of character and moral worth. In that barbarous eighth century she reminds us of Blanche of Castille, the mother of Saint Louis. It is a pity that contemporary writers have not left us more details about her. But at least we know the magnificent project she conceived and that she at first succeeded in realising in spite of the obstacles placed in her path. It was a question of nothing less than securing the peace of Europe by the union of the principal crowns—those of the Franks, the Lombards and the Bavarians, and of placing them all on terms of friendship with the Court of Rome.

Tassilo, Duke of Bavaria, was the son-in-law of Desiderius, the King of the Lombards. The former, a man of great energy and activity, was threatening the rule of the Franks across the Rhine. Bertha conceived the plan of marrying her son Charles to the other daughter of Desiderius, and, in order to make the alliance still stronger, to complete it by the union of her daughter, Giselle, with the latter's son, Adalgis. By this means concord would be established between the Franks and the Holy See, on the one hand, and the Lombards and the Bavarians on the other, and the peace of Europe secured. This was the policy outlined by Thiodoric the Ostrogoth in the sixth century—peace, and the idea of securing peace by means of family bonds between the rulers was revived by a woman.

As soon as Pope Stephen III heard of the plans of the French Court, he was mad with rage. An alliance between the Franks and the Lombards! His terror may well be imagined. He wrote a vehement letter to Charlemagne. Any such union declared, would be "diabolical." Charlemagne had in his own kingdom the most beautiful and amiable girls in the land. "Love them, it is your duty!" He had before him the example of his father, his grandfather, and his great-grandfather, which it was impossible for him to pardon this cynical, twofold insult.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The wars of Charlemagne against the Saxons began in 772; it was a struggle which was perpetually renewed and constituted the greatest feat of his reign—a contest lasting thirty-three years (772–804).

The territory of the Saxons was situated in the plains of Germany from the valley of the Rhine to the Elbe. Saxony of the eighth century did not include modern Saxony, but only Westphalia and Hanover. The Saxons had adhered to their ancient customs which were so much belauded by Tacitus. They still practised human sacrifice.

The thrust of the peoples who constituted part of the Scandinavia, which the Gothic historian Jordanes had already called the Factory of the Nations, was still continuing towards the south-west. From Scandinavia it made itself felt in Germany, and from Germany in Gaul.

War against the Saxons was therefore declared, says Eginhard, in 772: "It was prosecuted in every direction with equal vigour. It is difficult to say how often the Saxons presented themselves before the King as conquered suppliants, how often they promised to do as they were demanded, delivering up hostages, receiving ambassadors, and sometimes so weakened as to declare themselves ready to embrace the Christian faith, without, however, being able to overcome the desire to break their engagements."

In 773 the war against the Lombards broke out. Charlemagne had repudiated the daughter of King Desiderius under the influence of Pope Adrian. Desiderius retaliated by invading the exarchate given by Pepin to the Holy See. The supremacy of Lombardy had succeeded that of the Ostrogoths in Italy; and it was the ambition of Desiderius to found in the peninsula a great Empire similar to that which the Merovingians and Carlovingians had established in Gaul.

In answer to the Pope's appeal, Charlemagne twice asked Desiderius to return the exarchate to the Sovereign Pontiff. Receiving no satisfaction, he opened the campaign in the month of August 773. We have already mentioned the opposition on the part of the nobility of the kingdom to the Italian war under

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Hunald found himself face to face with the young King of France at the head of his army when he thought he was still a long way off, and sought refuge with Lupus I, Duke of Gascony. Charlemagne demanded that the fugitive should be delivered up to him. Lupus yielded, but Hunald managed to escape and found shelter at Pavia, at the Court of the King of the Lombards.

On the 1st of December, 771, the event took place which was destined completely to transform the fate of Charlemagne. Carloman died, leaving his elder brother, at the age of twenty-nine, sole ruler of the Empire.

As a matter of fact Carloman had two young sons, Pepin and Siagrus, who should have inherited their father's domains, but their mother Giburga, remembering the tragedy that had overtaken the children of Carloman, the son of Charles Martel, at the hands of Pepin the Short, and fearing a similar fate for her own sons if they were left to the tender mercies of Charlemagne, took flight with them and also sought refuge at the Court of the King of the Lombards.

The death of Carloman completely altered the outlook of Charlemagne. He was now the sole master of the French Kingdom. Wide horizons had been opened up to him and he was full of plans for a patriarchal policy. By supplementing the power of his arms through the high prestige of the Papacy no ambition seemed beyond his reach. It was necessary, he thought, to have the support of the Pope, whose own authority would be further increased by the fresh power the Holy See would derive from an alliance with the warriors of France. Bertha had made her son promise never to repudiate the daughter of King Desiderius, but Charlemagne, casting to the winds every consideration that appeared hostile to his ambition, after the death of his brother sent Desideria away, and married Hildegarda, a Swabian. He was thirty at the time, and she was his third wife, all three being alive. Adalard, the King's first cousin and one of the most remarkable men of the day, outraged by this act of treachery, ostentatiously quitted the Court and retired to his abbey at Corbie. As for his sister Giselle, who was betrothed to the son of King Desiderius, Charlemagne forced her to return to the Abbey of Chelles. The indignation of the King of the Lombards may well be imagined.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

it was impossible for him to pardon this cynical, twofold insult.

The wars of Charlemagne against the Saxons began in 772; it was a struggle which was perpetually renewed and constituted the greatest feat of his reign—a contest lasting thirty-three years (772–804).

The territory of the Saxons was situated in the plains of Germany from the valley of the Rhine to the Elbe. Saxony of the eighth century did not include modern Saxony, but only Westphalia and Hanover. The Saxons had adhered to their ancient customs which were so much belauded by Tacitus. They still practised human sacrifice.

The thrust of the peoples who constituted part of the Scandinavia, which the Gothic historian Jordanes had already called the Factory of the Nations, was still continuing towards the south-west. From Scandinavia it made itself felt in Germany, and from Germany in Gaul.

War against the Saxons was therefore declared, says Eginhard, in 772: “It was prosecuted in every direction with equal vigour. It is difficult to say how often the Saxons presented themselves before the King as conquered suppliants, how often they promised to do as they were demanded, delivering up hostages, receiving ambassadors, and sometimes so weakened as to declare themselves ready to embrace the Christian faith, without, however, being able to overcome the desire to break their engagements.”

In 773 the war against the Lombards broke out. Charlemagne had repudiated the daughter of King Desiderius under the influence of Pope Adrian. Desiderius retaliated by invading the exarchate given by Pepin to the Holy See. The supremacy of Lombardy had succeeded that of the Ostrogoths in Italy; and it was the ambition of Desiderius to found in the peninsula a great Empire similar to that which the Merovingians and Carlovingians had established in Gaul.

In answer to the Pope’s appeal, Charlemagne twice asked Desiderius to return the exarchate to the Sovereign Pontiff. Receiving no satisfaction, he opened the campaign in the month of August 773. We have already mentioned the opposition on the part of the nobility of the kingdom to the Italian war under

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Pepin the Short. This was renewed under Charlemagne. They regarded the repudiation of Desideria as perjury. Many of them, and among their number some of the highest in the land, had given themselves as security to the King of the Lombards when the marriage was celebrated, plighting their faith as a guarantee for their sovereign. But Desiderius met Charlemagne's efforts at reaching an agreement with such hostility that their scruples were silenced.

At the approach of the French in arms the Lombard army took to flight. Desiderius shut himself up in Pavia, and Charlemagne appeared before the walls of the town.

In this connection we have the account of the monk of Saint-Gall which has become justly celebrated. The author wrote at the end of the ninth century, at the request of the Emperor Charles the Great, to whom his work was dedicated, a hundred years after the events he describes. And just as Gregory of Tours wrote about Clovis, so did the monk of Saint-Gall treat the subject of Charlemagne. According to the chronicler, his tale of the exploits of Charlemagne was derived from the accounts given him by a certain Adalbert, the father of one of his fellow monks in the monastery.

L. Halphen believes he has identified this monk with Notker the Stammerer. He followed historical sources—more especially, as L. Halphen has pointed out, the chronicles of Eginhard—and poetical sources, epic lays in process of formation. As for the episode which follows, Gaston Paris says :

"The episode of Desiderius and Otkar is overburdened with ornament very far removed from primitive simplicity, and although the basis of this beautiful tale was without doubt some popular version, we can find no trace of that form; the lay provided the chronicler only with his subject, his presentation of it is entirely his own."

Here is an abbreviated version of this "beautiful tale."

Desiderius had shut himself in Pavia with Hunald, Duke of Aquitaine, whilst his son Adalgis had gone to Verona with the widow and children of Carloman.

Count Otkar, one of the great nobles of France, who had rebelled against his suzerain, was with Desiderius. One day they were standing on the top of a high tower from whence they could see the plain spread out below. In the distance Charlemagne's army was visible. First of all came the machines of war "such as might have been used in the armies of Darius or Cæsar."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Desiderius asked Otkar :

" Is not Charles with this great army ? "

" No."

Endless chains of common soldiers then appeared.

" Surely Charles is advancing with all that crowd ? "

" No," replied Otkar, " not yet."

Thereupon followed the bodyguard who rested not night or day.

At the sight of them the Lombard King, filled with terror, exclaimed :

" Of a certainty that is Charlemagne."

" No," replied Otkar, " not yet."

Next came the Bishops, the Abbots, the chapel priests and the Counts in all their splendour.

In tears Desiderius cried, " Let us go down and hide ourselves in the bowels of the earth."

Then Otkar said, " When you see the cornfields tremble, and the Po and the Ticino lashing the walls of the town with their waters blackened by steel, then will it be time enough for you to believe in the arrival of King Charles."

Hardly were the words out of his mouth than they saw rising out of the west a black cloud, which obscured the light of day, and as Charlemagne continued his advance the flash of the steel arms east over the town a veil darker than night. Charlemagne came forward clad from head to foot in a coat of mail, his head encased in a steel helmet, his left hand clasping a steel lance which he held perpendicular, as his right hand remained immovable on the hilt of his invincible sword; his shield was of steel, his horse was an iron grey; those who surrounded him, and those who followed, the whole army seemed made of steel. Steel covered the whole countryside. Steel that is so hard was borne by men who were harder still. Otkar and Desiderius were struck dumb, and at last Otkar murmured in a whisper :

" There is Charlemagne."

Notwithstanding all this array of steel the siege of Pavia

THE EARLIEST TIMES

the Assembly was generally convoked at Aix-la-Chapelle; under Charles the Bald in Neustria, in the west of France.

The General Assemblies were developments on an enlarged scale of the Merovingian champs de Mars, thus called, according to Hinemar, after the God of War, or, as is more probable, after the month of March in which they were held. Under the Carlovingians they were called champs de mai, the date of their convocation having been put later in the year by Pepin the Short, in order to allow the Bishops and Abbots to celebrate the festival of Easter in their own dioceses and monasteries.

The General Assembly was also called "plaid" placitum or "synod." Although it was originally convoked, not only in Austrasia, but also in Neustria and Burgundy, it fell into desuetude in the two latter kingdoms.

As the army which composed it consisted of the bulk of free citizens, it was also called "the Popular Assembly," populi conventus; but it was popular only in name, as Fustel de Coulanges has pointed out. Even in the beginning, when it included all the free citizens, it constituted, as a matter of fact, a reunion of the nobles, each of whom was accompanied by his followers. The chief alone counted.

Under Clotar II and Dagobert the military character of the meeting declined, and the Assembly came to occupy itself more and more with civil and ecclesiastical questions. With Charlemagne the military side once more took the ascendancy, but gradually faded into insignificance under Louis the Pious and Charles the Bald.

Even the Bishops, who attended the Assembly, came with their followers, supporters and vassals. Thus thousands of men found themselves gathered together in one vast convention, though they were divided into groups of very different characters, each chief, Bishop, Abbot, Count or Captain of a band, being followed by his own men, in some cases the number being only eight or ten, and in others several hundreds surrounding their "patron."

If the weather was fine, says Hinemar, the Assembly would be held in the open air. It must have presented a picturesque spectacle. Tents dotted the plain, and the rallying cries, the divers costumes and the great variety of costumes presented a lively tableau.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Only the nobles took part in the debates ; they were the only ones to express an opinion, though they had ascertained beforehand the views of the supporters and vassals who had accompanied them. Thus the General Assembly really consisted of hundreds of private assemblies each of which was represented before the King by its chief.

The procedure in case of bad weather is the proof of this. In such circumstances the Assembly met for debate under cover, away from the multitude. It had various places at its disposal, one of which was specially reserved for the Bishops and clerics of the highest rank, so that they might meet, says Hinemar, without mingling with the laity.

The laity also had their debating hall. "The Counts and other lay dignitaries," says Hinemar, "according to their rank, separated from the rest of the crowd early in the morning, until the deliberations in the presence or absence of the King began. Then these nobles, the clergy on their side and the laity on theirs, presented themselves at the hall appointed for them, where seats had been prepared in their honour. Away from the crowd, they sat all together or separately according to the nature of the business to be discussed, spiritual, secular or a mixture of the two." The Assembly had food brought to it from outside as it required it and convoked those whom it felt it ought to consult or listen to.

Ernold the Black depicts Louis the Pious presiding over one of these reunions and addressing his vassals from his throne above them.

The high officials and the Great Ones of the kingdom, gathered together in the Assembly, had received details of the administrative or other arrangements which the King himself, says Hinemar, had made under divine inspiration. The King was not present at the debate. By means of messengers chosen from amongst the Palatine officials, the Assembly in the course of its deliberations addressed questions to the King on points on which it was doubtful and received his replies. No stranger was allowed to approach the hall so long as the result of the discussion had not been communicated to the King.

Meanwhile the King mixed with the crowd, questioning one and another in a friendly way, cracking jokes with the young upon to approve the capitulary which decided the modalities of their government.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

These celebrated institutions—the General Assemblies or Carlovingian plaids—give the impression of having been on the whole extremely liberal, leaving the people, or at all events the governing class, great influence in the ruling of the State; but, as Fustel de Coulanges points out, their power was greater in appearance than in reality. The nobles consulted their men before they took part in the discussion at the May plaid, but these men were entirely subservient to them and the overlord said whatever he pleased; the King consulted the Bishops, the lords and the high officials, but here again they were all his dependents, and their part consisted chiefly in lending support to the royal decisions by their presence. Their activities, as has been pointed out, were above all moral and due to the mere reunion of such an imposing multitude in arms; without reversing the royal decision they could hold it in abeyance or modify its practical application, as we have seen it do in connection with the Italian policy after the intervention of Carloman.

We must now return to the Saxon wars.

The kingdom of the Carolingians was surrounded by a double rampart of enemies or rivals. On the north-east were the Saxon Wars. The Saxons and other German peoples, whom Egihard terms ferocious, on the south-east the Lombards, on the south the Aquitanians and the Gascons, on the west the Bretons; these constituted the first rampart. The second consisted of more distant nations, at least two of whom were a formidable menace, the north men, the Normans from the Scandinavian countries, and the Saracens from Africa; finally, in the east there were Byzantium and her Emperors.

The Lombards had been conquered.

In 774 the Saxons, profiting by the absence of Charlemagne, who was detained in Italy, renewed their incursions. They did not make a general invasion under the guidance of one supreme chief, but various tribes in succession hurled themselves upon Austrasia, massacring, pillaging and burning wherever chance led them. With his usual extraordinary rapidity of movement,

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Charlemagne appeared before them with his army when they thought he was still on the other side of the Alps. He divided his forces into four columns; three of these flung themselves upon the Saxons and overcame them, the fourth had only to contemplate the backs of a multitude in flight.

Thus, says Eginhard, the war with Saxony was renewed (774). "Never was a war longer or more atrocious; for the Saxons, like nearly all the nations of Germany, were endowed with natural ferocity; they worshipped devils, shewed themselves hostile to our religion, and saw nothing dishonourable in violating all laws, human and divine. Moreover, the nature of the frontiers between their own country and France meant that an incident might at any moment break the peace; consisting almost everywhere of level plains, except at a few points where large woods and mountains formed a line of demarcation, these frontier regions were constantly the scenes of murders, rapine and incendiarism. In the end the Franks became so exasperated that regarding it as insufficient in the future to give blow for blow, they made up their minds to break out into open warfare."

The Saxons had found, if not a leader, at least a marvellous inspirer, in the person of Witikind, who made himself the soul of the national defiance against the foreigner. Scholars have recently called him Widuking. Why could they not leave names celebrated in history the form hallowed by time?

Witikind was the Vereingetorix of the Germans. He was a far greater and finer figure than Arminius, a blameless hero whom we respectfully salute. He came from that part of Saxony corresponding with modern Westphalia. Like Vereingetorix he was of noble family and had great possessions. He was an organiser of uprisings against the stranger rather than a leader in battle. After the successive defeats of his fellow countrymen, he sought refuge in Denmark, with the object of seeking help there in order to march at the head of his own people against the Franks; but he never succeeded in bringing about a general insurrection.

The year 775 was marked for the Saxon patriots by a signal success, the victory of Lidbach, a defeat which Charlemagne sought to blot out in the following year, when his armies seemed to have achieved the conquest of Saxony. The soldiers marched forward followed by missionaries; for the King of France regarded the conquest of an enemy people only in the light of their conversion to Christianity.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Saxons were baptised in large numbers, so that in 777 Charlemagne thought he might envoke the vanquished, who appeared to be entirely subjected, to the May Assembly, held at Paderborn, in their own country. And indeed, various tribes arrived in arms under the leadership of their chiefs, just as the Austrasians and Neustrians did. But Witikind was not amongst them, having sought refuge together with his companions in Denmark.

A rude awakening followed. Neither defeat, baptism, soldiers nor missionaries could succeed in breaking the indomitable nation. Charlemagne remained in Saxony throughout 779 and a part of 780.

The year 782 was marked for the Franks by a defeat even more cruel than that of 773 at Lüdbach. Charlemagne had left two armies in Saxony, one of which was under the command of Count Theodoric, the best of his lieutenants. The other had three leaders, the Chamberlain Adalgis, the Constable Gelon and the Count of the Palace Wored. The latter army was surprised by bands led by Witikind and massacred to a man on the right bank of the Weser, at a place which historians call Sunthal or Suntelgebirg, according to whether they name it after the valley or the mountain.

Charlemagne knew how to be merciful to conquered rebels, but he could not pardon success. He entered Saxony with a powerful army, laying waste everything in his path, and forcing to be delivered up to him 4500 Saxons who were regarded as the chief helpers of Witikind, who had again sought refuge in Denmark. These 4500 patriots were all beheaded at Werden on the same day. The atrocity of this act of vengeance has remained famous in the annals of Germany.

These rivers of blood were completed by the terrible capitulary of the Sixons in which Charlemagne, as a Bishop in spirit, informed the conquered how he expected to see them practise his religion:

"Whosoever shall not respect the fast days or shall eat ^{at} in Lent shall be put to death; whosoever, at the instigation of the devil, shall burn one of his fellow-creatures, man or woman, or shall give their flesh to be eaten, or shall eat thercof himself, shall be punished with death" [in this case at least capital punishment is justified and the clause sheds a sombre light upon German civilisation at the end of the eighth century]. According to article VII the burning of a corpse "according to pagan rites" was also to be punished with death. Article VIII condemned to punishment by death any Saxon who, in order to escape baptism, "should hide himself among his fellow countrymen."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Article IX.—"Whosoever shall sacrifice a man to the devil according to pagan rites, shall be put to death." Here again is something which sheds light upon German civilisation in the time of "Karl der Grosse." By devil Charlemagne meant the ancient gods of the Saxons, Wotan and his fellow divinities, to whom numbers of Germans in our own day would fain return.

According to Article XI, whosoever should be guilty of disloyalty to the King of the Franks would be punished with death.

There is not a single article in his bloodthirsty edict which is not concluded with a threat of capital punishment.

"The pagan," says M. Halphen in conclusion, "is tracked down like a wild beast, and there is perhaps not another example in history of such a ferocious way of imposing the outward semblance of civilisation."

Finally Charlemagne had recourse, when all else failed, to the last expedient—that of wholesale deportation.

Towards the end of 785 Witikind abandoned the struggle in answer to the appeal of the French King and his promise that the past should be forgotten. Charlemagne stood god-father to him in person and covered him with gifts. But nothing is known of what became of him. Some historians regard him as a saint and others believe him to have been the ancestor of the Capets, of Saint Louis and Louis XIV. Let us turn our thoughts reverently to the death of Vercingetorix. At least Charlemagne here gave proof of the vast superiority of his character as compared with Julius Cæsar, and also bore witness to the fine moral progress achieved by Christianity in the Roman world.

In prosecuting the conquest of Saxony, and the assimilation of the Saxons by means of religion, Charlemagne acted in conformity with the nature of the royal authority—we had almost said of the priesthood—vested in him.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As early as the time of the Merovingians the Kings had occupied the position of the temporal chiefs of the clergy, and An now the ceremony of consecration, an innovation Ecclesiastical introduced by the Carlovingians, reinforced this Monarchy. authority. "The act of consecration," says Fustel de Coulanges, "was a sign of loyalty and submission on the part of the Bishops; the King became the Head of the Church." Having received the blessing of God, he had power to bless men, and in this respect the Chanson de Roland gives a true picture of Charlemagne.

The Carlovingian kings sat in the episcopal synods and presided over the councils. They gave their opinion on questions of ecclesiastical ruling and even took part in the discussions raised in connection with articles of dogma, discussions in which their opinion was final.

Carloman and Pepin were present at the meetings of the councils together with their councillors and certain leudes appointed by them. For the sake of convenience they arranged for these religious sessions to coincide with the assemblies of the soldiers, for no council was allowed to meet without authorisation from the King. The leudes, like the King, took part in the debates.

Naturally under Charlemagne this system was still more rigidly enforced.

Like the spring and autumn Assemblies, the councils had only the right of proposing a motion, even in the case of ecclesiastical matters and questions of faith. The decision communicated to the public depended on the royal pleasure.

The opinion expressed by Charlemagne at the synods and councils was frequently opposed to that of the Bishops, and even of the Sovereign Pontiff. He was stricter in the application of Church principles than the clergy themselves, and his opinion always prevailed. When the vote on the decisions of the council had been taken they were submitted to the King for ratification, and he was at liberty to accept, reject or amend them as he pleased. At the end of the eighth century it was not the Pope who was infallible, but the King. "Hencewith the articles that wisdom may add what is lacking, contrary to reason." The decisions of actuated upon with the King's consent, and seventy such decisions, introduced have been recorded. "Who of the Council of Soissons, " shall three and twenty Bishops and with the consent of the King and tried by the King or by the Bishops or side of his prerogatives attained such the legislative acts of Charlemagne, were concerned with matters of and the acts and behaviour of the reform of the episcopal churches cousin, Chrodegang, Bishop of Metz, of canonic rule. The system son, Louis the Pious. In his capituof the monasteries suggested by were finally adopted by Louis the the minutest details—rules of ritual, of the Church. It was not only in the pagan practices of which his dealing with the Saxons, had made a he showed himself implacable against districts where they still survived popular mind—magic formulæ against , against hail, drought and thunder-disease, love charms, enchanted at the tombs of the dead, thank offer-and the great forest trees.

a high hand with the Bishops, his in his tutelage the while. He called the churches," a definite title which rights. These churches were under King, in the ordinary meaning of the word. Bishops and Abbots found themselves placed under his "tutelage" and swore oaths of fealty to him. The prelate placed his hands in the hands of the King and said, "I will be faithful and obedient to you as a man should be to his lord." Charlemagne had episcopal sees in his gift as well as monasteries. Like Charles Martel, he bestowed them as benefices, on the same conditions as the counties and the treasury domains. "With this church or this abbey," he argued, "I can make for myself a loyal supporter." But, unlike Charles Martel, he only gave them to the clergy, the bishoprics at least, though he did not excuse recipients from military service. A petition presented in 803 by a group of leudes in favour of the Bishops opened with the following words.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

"We bend the knee before Your Majesty and make this prayer, that the Bishops may not be crushed by the burden of having to go to war, but that when we go forth in arms with Your Majesty they may remain in their parishes."

Neither bishoprics nor abbeys could be assigned without the King's consent. Charlemagne even dispensed with the pretence of election. He nominated directly to ecclesiastical offices the candidates who suited his convenience, and the best way of attaining them was through influence at the Palace. From the time of the Merovingians, as we have already seen, the higher clergy were largely recruited from the ranks of the palatine officials. Among the clergy about him Charlemagne picked out men of sound morality, firm in their faith and gifted with administrative ability, and placed them at the head of the bishoprics.

Moreover, without the authority of the King the prelates would have found themselves helpless. "Without the patronage of the King of the Franks," writes Saint Boniface, "I can neither govern the people among the faithful, nor correct the clergy, the monks and the nuns, without his instructions, I cannot succeed in stamping out pagan rites in Germany, in the sacrilegious worship of idols."

Charlemagne combated heresy in whatever form it made its appearance. He prosecuted the heretic who destroyed the souls of men as he would the robber who killed travellers on the high road. He presided over the council convened at to pass sentence on the heresiarch Felix, Bishop of Urgel, and over another council in 809, in which was debated the question which ever since Arius was continually being reopened, of the procession of the Holy Ghost. Charlemagne went even further; he would not allow his subjects to commit any sin. Willy nilly, he insisted on leading them to paradise, by force if necessary.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

His capitularies sometimes resembled sermons: "Love thy neighbour as thyself.—Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God.—Shun sin that thy faith may be strengthened. . . ." These are specimens of Charlemagne's legislative style. He not only recommends charity, he makes it obligatory. His capitularies prescribe worship, fasting, the observance of the sabbath, and regular attendance at the sermon. Everyone had to know the Lord's Prayer and to repeat it every day, and in the task he undertook of securing the practice of the Christian religion, he chose as his helpers, not only the higher clergy, the heads of monasteries, whose duty it was to circulate throughout the country a knowledge of the capitularies and to secure their observation, and for whom the task would naturally have been too great, but even in the meanest rural parish, the humblest country priest, the lowliest officiating minister.

"In the most distant villages," writes Georges Goyau, "the unity of civil and religious life was maintained. Whether built of wood or loam, at the mercy of fire, or made of stone, like the church which is still standing at Germigny-les-Prés (Loiret), these Carlovingian sanctuaries acted as mayoralties, courts of justice and notaries' offices; in case of invasion they became depositories, granaries and places of refuge. They resembled moral fortresses in which the peasant could place his person, his family and his goods in safety under the protection of the saint who, by his intercession in heaven, might perchance arm the hand of God, and by his prestige on earth might disarm the violence of the foe." The "rector," an ecclesiastical functionary who ruled a regular community of priests, deacons and clerics, had the royal mandate to seek out all malefactors and have them excommunicated.

The churches preserved the character given them by the

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Merovingians; civil as well as religious life found shelter within their gates. People met together in them, not only to pray, but also in order to talk—they were meeting places for gossip. At certain hours the basilica became a forum, in which the merchants had their stalls—a regular exchange.

Let us examine the picture as a whole; far from being separated, as in our own day, Church and State were closely united, and formed one whole, from the top of the huge hierarchy, at the pinnacle of which was the King, soon to be Emperor, the sovereign chief of his leudes, his men at arms, and, through them, of the whole people, who was also the head of the Church, controlling the higher clergy, forcing the sap of his ordinances to circulate to the smallest branches of the huge tree, administering and governing the whole nation through the agency of the clergy much more than by means of the Counts, who acted chiefly as judges, or his famous Missi Dominici, who were merely inspectors.

As a matter of fact, even the Missi were charged by Charlemagne with religious duties. In 802 the Emperor, in Article XIV of the capitulary concerning them, said "We are desirous that they should win eternal life for us." The capitulary of 806 contained the following words "Let each man, in the carrying out of his mission, take care to arrange everything according to the will of God."

The Gallic clergy did not find a lenient master in Charlemagne. The monk of Saint Gall calls him "the pious overseer of the Bishops," a pious overseer indeed, who kept his subordinates well in hand. He used to summon the Bishops to his presence in order to question them and dictate their line of conduct, and when we behold the humility of an archbishop in the presence of a Count of the Palace or of a mere priest who occupied a low rank in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, but who had access to the King either as nuncio or chaplain royal, it is easy to imagine the attitude of the highest dignitaries at the foot of the throne, and their complete abasement. The King observed the most respectful attitude towards them, but this merely served to cloak his position of absolute authority and his vigilance against the smallest deviation from duty. The King gave his commands and charged the Bishops with the execution of his behests. They were merely officials. The Royal Commissioners, the Missi Dominici, acted as zealous inspectors of the monasteries, visited the bishopries and sent their reports to the King. They summoned the prelates before them and questioned them about the management of their dioceses. None of the clergy were allowed to leave the country, even to go to Rome, without the royal permission.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Charlemagne superintended the doctrines of the Bishops and the teaching they spread abroad, and he was never tired of reminding them to remain strictly faithful to the dogmas. "Visit your dioceses, see to it that everything is in conformity with the rules of the Church, and that your clergy are instructed in their profession." He forbade the Bishops to hunt, to ride on horseback through the forests surrounded by howling packs of dogs or to hunt with the falcon or hawk. He would not allow them to wear golden belts holding knives with handles studded with precious stones, or to put on spurs or baldricks, nor could they entertain pretty women.

Leo III, the successor of Adrian, sent Charlemagne the keys of Saint Peter's tomb, as Zacharias had done in the case of Pepin. Charlemagne responded by sending his son-in-law Angilbert, Abbot of Saint-Riquier, on a mission to Rome. Angilbert went loaded with gifts, but also with instructions. The King of the Franks laid down the law to Leo. He recommended him to observe the canons in terms which would have filled a Gregory VII, an Innocent III or a Boniface VIII with the greatest amazement.

When he crossed the frontier his conduct was still the same. His chief care was to spread the faith. He sent missionaries as far as Sweden, and the advice he gave to foreign princes was almost always directed towards the strengthening of Catholicism.

It has been maintained that the preference shown by Charlemagne for his wars against the Saxons rather than for conflicts which would have been simpler and more fruitful was due to his desire to draw pagan peoples to the doctrines of Christ. The oldest German historians regarded him as a defender of the faith rather than as a conqueror, and called him "the apostle of Saxony and Westphalia." It was the same with regard to his wars against the Huns, whilst he spared the Greeks, ruled agriculture to provide all that was required in the way of manufactured articles—there were blacksmiths and carpenters, cordwainers and saddlers, brewers and millers, and representatives of more uncommon trades, such as workers in iron, goldsmiths, silversmiths, turners and rope-makers. An interesting section of the Carlovingian villa was the women's quarter, in which the women worked. Charlemagne in his capitulary De Villis devoted special attention to them. The rooms had to be warmed with stoves, the gates were to be solidly built, and the surrounding hedges well trimmed; there was to be a large hall for the winter evenings. The variety of articles made by the women is surprising—pottery, vases and utensils of all kinds, linen, wool, woad and madder for dyeing, carding combs and boards, and soap. They wove wool and linen and made cloth and serge for the use of the Palace.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Moreover, we may well imagine all that the King received from his country villas—wool and linen materials and plates and dishes, in the way of food, pork of all kinds, pickled pork and bacon, ham, various meats, either smoked or preserved in brine, especially goat's meat, and fish in large quantities. Fish was so plentiful that Charlemagne used to sell it. His farmers sent him cheeses, butter, mustard, vinegar, flour, vegetables and fruit. He was supplied with butchier's meat, including even cow beef from animals that had to be killed because they were lame and horses killed not necessarily because they had anything wrong with them. He received large quantities of honey which took the place of sugar and produced a fermented liquor known as mead. Charlemagne insisted on the wine being made cleanly without being pressed by the feet. His villas supplied his Court with ale, blackberry wine and liqueur. He sold the horns and skins of his goats. He and his people clothed themselves in wolf skins, with which the tenants of his domains could supply him in good condition.

In addition to the produce and resources of the Royal domain, there were the gracious—and obligatory—gifts made by the nobles and the leudes at the annual assemblies, as well as the tribute paid by the vassal nations and lucrative spoils from the enemy country—the treasure of the King of the Lombards, a son of the Avars, more especially, provided a sumptuous booty.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Such, in its great simplicity, are the outlines of Charlemagne's government—the religious hierarchy, the lay hierarchy, each acting by means of their own forces and their internal energy, in touch with the King only through their leaders and directed by an administration which was still very simple and had nothing to do with public services. Such was the Carlovingian Empire.

Imagine a King endowed with a gift for organisation as great as that of Napoleon I, for example—though lacking the latter's amplitude, versatility, suppleness and brilliance, for the earlier task was infinitely less complicated—and it is easy to see how a man of intelligence, good sense and energy, enjoying good health but not endowed with any exceptional gifts, Louis XIV if you wish, and certainly Charlemagne, was able, surrounded by the glamour of the greatest epic poetry the world has ever known, to cut such a magnificent figure in the annals of history.

Powerful as was the religious organisation in the Empire of Charlemagne, it was not the only one; side by side with Dukes, Counts and Marquises. it were the wheels of the civil system, which, however, were closely united with it. The fundamental divisions of the Empire were the counties, which were as a rule a development from the cities which the Christians had found in Gaul and on the foundations of which they had established their dioceses. There were a hundred and ten or a hundred and twenty counties in the territory of what is now France, each one under the rule of a Count. But it was not the district that appointed the official, as the department to-day appoints its préfet. A county was the territory ruled by a Count and could be changed at the pleasure of the King. There were very large counties, like the County of Auvergne, and very small ones, like the County of Senlis.

Several Counts might be subject to the authority of a Duke, but this was not necessarily the case. It must not be imagined that the Duchies were subdivided into counties, as a department is to-day subdivided into sous-préfectures. The authority of a Duke consisted in his right of command over several Counts, which was conferred upon him to meet a passing emergency, but which might nevertheless last a long time.

The Marquises were Counts charged with some special military mances. Those who could not afford more were obliged to join together to defray the expense of equipping one man.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As the King's lieutenant, the Count was an absolute sovereign in his own district. He was supported by the viscount, who was really a substitute performing the functions of the Count when the latter was at the Palace or with the army. The Count also left him to judge matters of minor importance.

The vicars, centurions and tithing-men were subordinates of inferior rank, and, like their chief, moreover, they wielded the most divers powers. They were at once administrators, judges, chiefs of police and captains. They were appointed by the Count.

It is easy to see what would happen when once the sovereign no longer exercised the necessary authority to summon the Counts to appear before him once a year, when the institution known as the Missi Dominici had become corrupted, and when the tendency of functions to become permanent and hereditary increased. These changes had indeed come into being at the end of the ninth century, and the result was that the Count became the lord and master of his county.

When, moreover, we remember that the Bishops also had their vicars, vidames, centurions and other agents, who were their retainers—in this case in a private capacity—and when we imagine them, frequently pugnacious and truculent as they were, forming part of the social organisation described above, it is not difficult to understand that they too ultimately became masters in their dioceses. However energetic, determined, active and intelligent a sovereign might be, it became no longer possible for him to assert his power effectively in the circumstances, and it has been very rightly observed of Charlemagne that, at the end of the ninth century, he would not have cut a better figure than his successors.

But, for the time being, the monarch was still master in his own kingdom. In one of the statutes we read: "Let no one dispute the prince's ban, question his deeds or oppose his will." The royal pleasure was, in fact, law.

Charlemagne has been regarded as a great legislator. But his statutes are for the most part regulations of a wholly temporary kind, called into being by circumstances which, for quently, were purely local in their effect. He has been praised for the fact that "he never attempted to establish uniformity in the laws governing his Empire." He certainly had the ability to bow before the most diverse customs, and endeavoured to turn them to account in furthering his policy. Under his rule every man was judged according to the law, or rather according to the customs of his nation. And Charlemagne made it his business to find out what these customs were. He had them recorded in writing so that they might be more efficiently applied, and this is one of his titles to glory. And when he wished to modify or amend these customs, he was obliged more than once to abandon his scheme owing to the opposition it provoked. When it was a matter of modifying local customs, he took care to consult the competent authorities. Hincmar describes the procedure in this case as follows :

THE CARLOVINGIANS

"When the Great of the land were assembled, they were shown the statutes which the mind of the prince had conceived under divine inspiration, or which had been called for by some need that had arisen in the interval between the sessions. And when they had taken due note of their import, they would discuss them clause by clause. Then their conclusions were placed before the prince, who, with the wisdom that God gave him, adopted a form of law which all had to obey."

Charlemagne himself divided his statutes into three categories. The first included the statutes which he termed "written for themselves," and it consisted of those laws concerned with administration which were valid only for one reign.

The second category included the "additions to the laws." It, consisted of those statutes which most resembled laws properly so-called, but with this difference—that they were only the additions or modifications made in regard to the customs of a particular people. That which was valid for the Saxons was not valid for the Aquitanians, and that which was valid for the Aquitanians was not valid for the Lombards. They were, however, permanent in character. In 803, for instance, Stephen, Count of Paris, made known to the people of the city the statute added to the Salic law.

"The statutes were delivered to Count Stephen in order that he might make them known to the city of the Parisians assembled in the public 'mallus,' and have them read before the sheriffs. This he did. And the whole assembly agreed that they should continue valid for all time, and everyone—Bishops, Abbots and Counts—ratified them with their own hand."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

As regards the statutes for the Misericordia Domini, these were laws of a particular kind, and consisted of instructions of the prince to those whom he entrusted with some kind of mission.

This consent given to the laws was not an empty formality. It was preceded by the ratification of the Great of the land, assembled in arms—an assembly of great importance and authority. Again in 813 we behold the Bishops, Abbots, Counts and notables converging on Aix-la-Chapelle from every corner of the Empire in answer to a summons to frame Imperial legislation. These Assemblies constitute the most important part of Charlemagne's institutions, and in them the powerful Emperor displayed his magnanimity, his liberal spirit, and his understanding of the needs of those whom he governed or had conquered. Thus he left to the nations gathered under his sway—the Aquitanians, Saxons or Lombards—their own particular customs, and allowed his agents to interfere with them only in order to make them observe their own traditions more exactly.

The organisation which we have just described did not allow any scope for administrative government. This was impossible. Aquitaine. And thus Charlemagne was obliged to grant to the various peoples of his Empire a large measure of autonomy. Except for certain pagan practices, which Charlemagne could not tolerate, even the Saxons retained their own customs, and in the person of his son Louis—later known as Louis the Pious and surnamed the Debonair—he gave to the Aquitanians a sovereign of their own. The partition of the kingdom among the Merovingian princes had been a necessity, and even a ruler like Charlemagne found himself compelled to adopt the same expedient. Thus he gave to the Aquitanians his son Louis, and insisted on that section of the kingdom being governed in accordance with its own customs and traditions, &c., &c., in a great measure, by men of Aquitaine or Gascon birth. One fact recorded by the historian of Louis the Pious, the Abbot Alcuin, who is known as the Astronomer, is characteristic. In a.c.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

ance with his father's instructions, the young king of Aquitaine wore the Gascon costume—the circular cap, the long shirt that reached down to the knees with its flowing sleeves, and the spurs strapped to the boots. With his javelin in his hand, he thus looked as if he were one of the warriors of the country.

Charlemagne never called upon the Aquitanians to participate in the wars he waged against the Germanic peoples, the Slavs or the Huns; but reserved them for his struggles with the Saracens in Septimania and Spain. Always stimulated by his religious zeal and his desire to guarantee his southern frontiers, Charlemagne continued his struggle against the Crescent. Since the days of Charles Martel a revolution had brought changes into the Arab world. The dynasty of the Omaides had been overthrown by the Abbassides at Bagdad, and the Emirs of Spain, who were hostile to their new masters, had at last appealed for help to the Frankish monarch. In 778, at the head of a large body of troops, he passed through the defiles of the Pyrenees, while another of his armies crossed into Spain over the Roussillon mountains.

In accordance with his usual custom the Frankish king invaded the country which he intended to conquer at several different points at the same time with the view of surprising the enemy, baffling him and terrifying him by exaggerating the gravity of his peril. He took possession of several important places—Pampeluna, Gerona and Huesca—and came in sight of Saragossa. What happened outside this fortress? The Frankish and Arab chroniclers do not agree. Did Charles suffer a check, or did he withdraw after extracting a sum of money from the Mussulmans? The first version, which is the Arabs', is the more probable. At all events Charlemagne beat a retreat. And it was while returning to Gaul that the French rearguard, commanded by Rolando, Duke of the Marches of Brittany, allowed himself to be surprised by a party of Basque mountaineers. Under the cover of their rocky gorges, they suddenly pounced on the Frankish host and destroyed it to a man.

This was the famous Battle of Roncevalles, of which we know the precise date—the 15th of August, 788—thanks to the epitaph of the Seneschal Egihard, who was killed at Rolando's side.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The Count maintained that he had cause for complaint against Fastrada, Charlemagne's fourth, but not his last, wife. The conspiracy was discovered. Charlemagne treated the conspirators with leniency and repaired the harm the Queen had done; but Hartrad had his eyes put out. Queen Fastrada died in 794, having presented the King only with daughters.

It was on his return from the siege of Saragossa that Charlemagne found himself the father of his third son, Louis the Pious, the child of Queen Hildegarda. In 781, when the boy was three, he was consecrated King of Aquitaine by the Sovereign Pontiff, whilst Charlemagne made his son Pepin King of the Lombards. An event of the year 787, recorded by the Astronomer, shows how full of life local institutions, with their separatist tendencies, still remained, and helps to explain the rapid dislocation of the Carlovingian Empire after the death of its founder. Adalric, son of Lupus II, Duke of Gascony, who has been held responsible for the attack at Roncevalles, seized Corso, whom Charlemagne had appointed Duke of Toulouse, and forced him to swear oaths of fealty to him. Charlemagne in a rage convoked a General Assembly in Septimania, at a place which the Astronomer calls "La Mort des Goths". Adalric was summoned to attend, but he only came after an exchange of hostages with the powerful King of the Franks. And behold the young Gascon noble making his appearance in the Assembly holding his head up and speaking with proud disdain. "On account of the danger to the hostages," says the Astronomer, "they did not dare to do anything to him." Adalric even received presents, returned the hostages, received back his own and retired in freedom. This episode throws a clear light on Charlemagne's rule in Gaul.

Louis, King of Aquitaine, first served his apprenticeship in arms in 791, when he was in his fourteenth year. Charlemagne performed the ceremony of girding him with his sword, and the old French historian maintained was "the institution of chivalry and the fashion of arming Knights." From that time forward the King of the Franks himself took in hand the education of his son, had him to live with him for long periods and endeavoured to teach him his profession of King. Louis died in great need of this paternal guidance, as he displayed a weakness of character which proved the bane of his reign. In 795 his father expressed surprise at his parsimony and his mediocre manner of life. He discovered that the Great Ones of Aquitaine had little by little despoiled the domains attached to the Crown. It was the old game of the benefices. And the King was forced to send Gilbert, afterwards Archbishop of Rouen, and Richard, the steward of his own domains, as Missi to Aquitaine to have the lands restored.

The internal dissensions between the Mussulmans continued to serve the cause of the Franks. The various Emirs had made themselves independent of the new dynasty established at Bagdad and the stronger made themselves masters of the weak. One of them, Abdullah, came to Charlemagne to beg for his intervention, and returned to Spain, with Louis, King of Aquitaine, in command of contingents of armed leudes. Several places in Catalonia, Gerona, Vich, Caserras, were occupied by the Franks. In 800 and 801 Lerida and Barcelona were added, and thus the Spanish March was formed. Crooked-Nosed William, who had been beaten on the Plain of Larchamp, routed the troops the Calif of Cordova had sent for the relief of Barcelona, and thus, after the defeat of Larchamp, a victory was celebrated for William also by the author of the "geste Guillaume." And thus the Spanish March was formed consisting of northern Catalonia and Navarre.

The greater became the extent of Charlemagne's Empire the more numerous were his enemies, so that the King of the Franks

Huns and Danes. now found himself face to face with the infidel, which made him wax ever more enthusiastic in his task of conversion. Across the Pyrenees his Empire reached the frontiers of Spain, where he came into contact with the Saracens; on the Saxon frontier there were the Huns in Pannonia (Hungary), the Danes (Normans) in Scandinavia, and in the shadowy East the Slavonic peoples.

This meant war without ceasing. But the King, thanks to his gifts of organisation and his rapidity of movement, which we have already discussed, was quite capable of dealing with the situation.

The year 790 is a red-letter year in the annals of his tumultuous reign, for it was a year of peace.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In 791 a great expedition took place against the Huns, a regular crusade, for its object was the conversion of the infidel. The priests went about preaching a holy war, as they did later on during the crusades under Philip I. The King's camp was like a busy Abbey where fasts were de rigueur, where snatches of canticles were wafted on the breeze and public intercession unfolded an endless chain of prayer, whilst processions marched along flaunting all the brilliance of their sacerdotal vestments.

Charlemagne, as was his custom, invaded Pannonia from three different directions, through Bohemia, Bavaria and Istria. The great Count Theodoric, his best lieutenant, was in command of the columns consisting of Saxons and Thuringians; for Charlemagne, like the Romans before him, knew how to transform conquered peoples into champions of his cause. Theodoric advanced along the left bank of the Danube, whilst the King took the right bank. The Bavarians supplied the commissariat by a service of boats on the river, and, lastly, the Dukes of Friuli and Istria brought troops from Italy. The latter alone engaged in conflict and put the Huns to flight, Charlemagne and Theodoric arrived in time to divide the spoils.

In 792 the conspiracy of Pepin the Hunchback, Charlemagne's eldest son, by his first wife Hililtruda, broke out. Charlemagne had excluded him from the partition of his Empire on account of his deformity. The conspiracy seems to have been very serious, for the King acted with extreme severity, and punishments of all kinds were inflicted. Pepin the Hunchback alone had his life spared. His father had his head shaved and shut him up in the convent of Prüm. It was impossible to enter the portals of any monastery of the vast Empire without coming across a son, grandson, brother, uncle, nephew or cousin of the King bearing the tonsure and consecrated to the Lord in order to make him keep the peace. The conspiracy of Pepin the Hunchback had been divulged by a Lombard priest whom Charlemagne rewarded by the gift of the Abbey of Saint Denis.

And now a fresh insurrection broke out in Saxony. It burst out in the form of a great national movement. Priests laid their throats cut, churches were burnt, and idols set up—more—a rude awakening for the conqueror.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Charlemagne had made Count Theodoric Governor of Saxony, and we have seen how the latter had led the Saxons to war against the Avars. But it was precisely a rising of the Saxon troops in his command that unloosed the rebellion. At the passage of the Weser the Saxon contingents mutinied and cut to pieces the detachment serving as their escort. Charlemagne's work was entirely destroyed, and he learnt that the Saxons had even gone so far as to make an alliance with the Huns.

It was at this juncture that the policy of transportation came to be practised on a large scale. In whole districts a third of the population were taken away and settled in France, their place being taken by Slavs, the declared enemies of the Saxons.

The policy of devastation was also renewed with increased fury, and Charlemagne spent the years 795, 796 and 797 in ravaging, burning and pillaging this unhappy country. Towards the end of 797 he at last felt he had realised his object, and on the 25th of October he published his second Saxon capitulary in terms which were more moderate, better considered and more politic than the first. This capitulary sums up the conclusions reached by the Assembly of Aix-la-Chapelle (October 798), to which not only Frankish officials, but delegates from the districts concerned had been summoned to deliberate on the affairs of Saxony. The capitulary of 785 was like an iron law imposed on the vanquished by a victor who considered only his own pleasure; the capitulary of 797 was more like an agreement which took into account the aspirations and needs of the people upon whom it was imposed. Nevertheless the worship of idols was strictly forbidden.

The years 795-797, in which the Saxon war was Charlemagne's chief preoccupation, also saw him prosecuting his campaigns against the Huns (Avars). In 795 their famous ring—formed by means of a series of fortifications in concentric circles—was captured together with all its legendary treasures. The ring, it was said, contained the vast booty collected by Attila on his fabulous expeditions, and, if we may believe Eginhard, Charlemagne's warriors must have enriched themselves beyond the dreams of avarice on these wonderful spoils. The the real governor of the city, like the Bishops in Gaul, though the bonds with Byzantium were not severed.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In the midst of this extraordinary and complicated state of affairs the risings of the month of April 799 broke out against Leo III, a timid and retiring Pontiff, of downcast mien, who bore upon his person the stamp of his humble origin, so different from his predecessor Adrian I, with his princely bearing and proud, haughty and independent character.

On the 25th of April, 799, Leo III, in the midst of a solemn procession, was making his way towards the church of San Lorenzo in Lucina, when he was attacked by an armed band under the command of Paschal and Campulus, high officials in the pontifical palace and nephews of Adrian. The Sovereign Pontiff was riddled with wounds, after which, if we may believe Eginhard, he had his tongue torn out and his eyes put out. He was hurled, covered with blood, into the depths of the monastery of Saint Erasmus, from which he was rescued on the intervention of two Missi sent by Charlemagne. On regaining his liberty, the Holy Father hastened to throw himself at the feet of the Frankish King, who was presiding over one of his General Assemblies at Paderborn in Saxony.

After the fashion of the inhabitants of Rome in the Middle Ages, the assailants excused their conduct by bringing the worst accusations against the Pontiff—simony, adultery, perjury, idolatry and murder. The recital became monotonous in its violence, for it was repeated again and again. The scenes which ended in the “attempt” at Anagni, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, were far from being isolated occurrences in the annals of the Papacy.

And thus, as L. Halphen says, “the Pope was not only a victim, he was also accused of crime.”

Charlemagne sent Leo back to Rome with a guard to protect him. He had no doubt promised to go there himself soon after, and indeed we find him appearing in Rome on the 24th of November of the year 800. Leo III welcomed him at the door of St. Peter's with all the traditional magnificence of papal functions. Charlemagne was the arbitrator in the case.

On the 1st of December the King of France presided in the basilica of St. Peter over an Assembly similar to that which he was accustomed to convoke in Gaul, in which the ecclesiastical dignitaries mingled with the laity, the officials and the nobility. He summoned the Pope to appear before him, just as in Gaul he summoned conspirators and plotters, or those who had been accused of treason or any other capital crime.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Leo III presented himself on the 23rd of December for examination. Can we rely on the account given by Eginhard? Seeing the important part the biographer of Charlemagne played at Court, I think we may. What a terrible spectacle was afforded by this Prince of the Church at bay, with his hollow eye-sockets, two black holes, his open mouth, another black hole, reduced to defending himself by means of an interpreter in the basilica of St. Peter, before a barbarian King surrounded by his leudes in coat of mail! Leo III was pronounced innocent, and his aggressors, Paschal and Campulus, were condemned.

The Sovereign Pontiff succeeded in raising himself from this humiliation by means of an act of inspiration which has the appearance of a flash of genius—raising himself with his own hands in such a way as to place himself above his judge, while seeming the while to cover him with the highest honours.

It was the 25th of December, Christmas Day.

The account of what happened appears in the Annales Royales:

“ Everything being ready on the holy day of Christmas, at the moment when, after having prayed on his knees during Mass before the confessional of St. Peter, the King was about to stand up, Pope Leo placed a crown on his head and the people acclaimed him :

“ ‘ Hail Charles Augustus, crowned by God, great and pacific Emperor of the Romans, long life and victory to thee ! ’ ”

As we know the imperial power had been divided between two heads, one of which was honoured with the title of Emperor Augustus, and the other with that of Emperor Cæsar, the former of the two titles being superior to the latter.

The Annales Royales continue in the following terms :

“ After these acclamations the Emperor was adored by the Pontiff—according to the custom of princes in former times, in the pagan fashion—and instead of the title of Patrician he was henceforward known by that of Emperor Augustus.”

卷之三十一

the real g
bonds wi

In the affairs t'
Leo III bore up from h proud,

On
proce-Loren under the ;
Pont
Egit was of S of the
F:
A

4

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Eginhard, "shut his eyes as if nothing had happened, not even the slightest dishonour." And to wipe out any such dishonour the Emperor made Hiltruda Abbess of Faremoutier.

Like Louis XIV, Charlemagne had little to complain of from the fair sex, with the exception of the beautiful Amalberga. It is said that the King pursued her with declarations of passionate devotion, but that the lady refused to listen to him. One day Charles seized her round the waist, she struggled and fell, and apparently broke her arm.

We have seen how badly Charles's education had been neglected. He did not know how to write. In later years he endeavoured to make good his deficiencies by studying grammar, rhetoric, dialectic and especially astronomy. Such curiosity was certainly laudable, but his studies led only to very imperfect results. According to Eginhard, his principal teacher was the famous Alcuin, an Anglo-Saxon, and the most learned man of the age. Charlemagne could, however, understand Latin, which probably means that he knew the Romance language spoken by his Gallic subjects. He appears to have learnt a little Greek.

Eginhard has given us a detailed description of the Emperor as an old man. He was strong and broad-shouldered, above the average height, tall, stout and heavy. He had a protuberant belly and a long neck. His eyes were large and vivacious, his nose was long. In old age he had beautiful white hair. With regard to his beard, it is curious that all the artists of our own day, both painters and sculptors, depict him with a magnificent beard, whilst historians are of opinion that he wore only a moustache, basing their view on the mosaic in St. John Lateran, which represents him with Pope Leo III kneeling at the foot of St. Peter's throne. But this mosaic in its present state was restored at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and before this Charlemagne was represented with a full beard.

Charlemagne had pleasing features, open and full of gaiety; in his conversation he was jovial, cordial and hail-fellow-well-met, but nevertheless gave the impression of great strength and majesty. It is curious to note that this imperious and commanding man had a shrill voice, the voice of a woman. He than Maria-Theresa and Madame de Montespan. They spent much more time in camps than in their palace.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Charlemagne took the education of his daughters, Rotruda, Bertha, Gisla, Thiderada and Hiltruda, the two latter the daughters of Fastrada, seriously in hand. He kept them with him and tried to make them good housekeepers. He had them taught to spin linen and wool, which did not prevent them from being great coquettes, fond of fine surroundings, silk dresses and brilliant jewels. Their coffers were full of such things. Their royal father took a delight in granting their wishes, but he would not allow them to marry. Eginhard is of opinion that as they were very beautiful and agreeable companions, the Emperor wanted to keep them with him. And, indeed, he was hardly ever away from them, never eating his supper without them, and taking them with him on his journeys and expeditions "His sons," says Eginhard, "rode on horseback at his side, whilst his daughters followed with the last squadron of the bodyguard specially entrusted with the task of looking after them" A more powerful motive no doubt was Charlemagne's fear of making any Frankish or Gallie noble whom he admitted into his family too important a personage. We know the constant rebellions that broke out in his reign and how terrified he was of them.

The majority of his daughters took the veil, the rest married without the consent of their father, and even without the help of the Church, which, combined with the conjugal morality of the great King himself, must have made a fine home of the Palace. Thus one of his daughters had as husband the poet who called himself the fair Homer. His genius flourished in the palatine school founded by Alcuin. He became a monk and was made Abbot of Saint Riquier. His name was Albertrbert, and he was afterwards canonised. Charlemagne had a very high opinion of him and entrusted him with confidential missions. By his union with Bertha he had a son, the historian Nithard, a man of worth, a clever and valiant soldier, and the best writer of annals of the first half of the ninth century.

By Count Horie, Rotruda had a son named Louis, who became Abbot of St. Denis, whilst Hiltruda with her favorite amours made a great scandal at Court. "Charlemagne," says

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Eginhard, "shut his eycs as if nothing had happened, not even the slightest dishonour." And to wipe out any such dishonour the Emperor made Hiltruda Abbess of Faremoutier.

Like Louis XIV, Charlemagne had little to complain of from the fair sex, with the exception of the beautiful Amalberga. It is said that the King pursued her with declarations of passionate devotion, but that the lady refused to listen to him. One day Charles seized her round the waist, she struggled and fell, and apparently broke her arm.

We have seen how badly Charles's education had been neglected. He did not know how to write. In later years he endeavoured to make good his deficiencies by studying grammar, rhetoric, dialectic and especially astronomy. Such curiosity was certainly laudable, but his studies led only to very imperfect results. According to Eginhard, his principal teacher was the famous Alcuin, an Anglo-Saxon, and the most learned man of the age. Charlemagne could, however, understand Latin, which probably means that he knew the Romance language spoken by his Gallic subjects. He appears to have learnt a little Greek.

Eginhard has given us a detailed description of the Emperor as an old man. He was strong and broad-shouldered, above the average height, tall, stout and heavy. He had a protuberant belly and a long neck. His eyes were large and vivacious, his nose was long. In old age he had beautiful white hair. With regard to his beard, it is curious that all the artists of our own day, both painters and sculptors, depict him with a magnificent beard, whilst historians are of opinion that he wore only a moustache, basing their view on the mosaic in St. John Lateran, which represents him with Pope Leo III kneeling at the foot of St. Peter's throne. But this mosaic in its present state was restored at the beginning of the seventeenth century, and before this Charlemagne was represented with a full beard.

Charlemagne had pleasing features, open and full of gaiety; in his conversation he was jovial, cordial and hail-fellow-well-met, but nevertheless gave the impression of great strength and majesty. It is curious to note that this imperious and commanding man had a shrill voice, the voice of a woman. He ment. It certainly accomplished a great work. Just imagine the mixture, the hotch-potch of races, leaders of bands, Bishops ruling their cities, great landowners governing their domains, a whole multitude of men attached to different institutions, traditions and customs! What a medley of tongues too! And from this formidable mixture Charlemagne made a unified whole! The idea of patriotism and nationality did not exist. When the Chanson de Roland sang of sweet France, it was the île de France that was meant. Charlemagne's achievement can, it is true, be explained on the score of his energy, his resolute will and his untiring activity, but also by the fact that his work remained entirely superficial. Beneath the cloak of apparent submission each social power preserved its own autonomy in the canton in which it was established. It ruled independently of the Emperor, the Bishop being the sovereign in his city, the landed proprietor in his domain and even the Count in his county.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

And thus the extent and brilliance of the Carolingian Empire, as well as its fragile nature, can be explained. Never has a great Empire, apparently so firmly built, been known to fall to pieces with such rapidity. The renaissance of art and letters which the Emperor tried to conjure into life among his people was also entirely superficial, factitious and vain. It gave birth to nothing and produced nothing; it could not produce anything. It was from the lowest strata of the nation that, after the death of Charlemagne, incomparable masterpieces were to be produced. Poets afterwards sang his glory in songs of epic grandeur, but they did so without his ever having known them or inspired them except by providing them all unwittingly with the west of their embroidery.

The Germans, very proud of Charlemagne, "Karl der Grosse," have tried to annex him. But their contention is foolish. Let us consider it for a moment. It is not even true to say that Charlemagne was German born. As we have already seen there was as much Gallo-Roman as Teutonic blood in his veins. And even if he had been a Teuton he still would not have been a German. Modern France is the outcome of a mixt of three races, the Ligurians, the Celts and the Teutons. The numerical importance of the Teutons is hardly less than that of the Celts. Germany too is made up of three races, the Teutons, the Celts and the Slavs. A pure Teuton might be a Frenchman and a pure Celt might be a German. One of Charlemagne's poets puts the following words in his mouth : " France witnessed my birth." And indeed he was born in Neustria, crowned at Soissons and took up his residence at Aix-la-Chapelle, which formed a point of military observation precisely against the Germans. For Aix-la-Chapelle on the west bank of the Rhine was at that time regarded as being on Gallic territory. We know the contempt with which Eginhard, the confidant, collaborator and historian of Charlemagne, speaks of the Teutons across the Rhine, and also the terrible way in which Charlemagne himself fought the Germanic peoples, ravaging without mercy with his Gallic troops the Teutonic territories which were richest in German blood—Westphalia, Hanover and Saxony. And writers of the period also made no mistake about it. Historians of the tenth, eleventh and twelfth centuries without exception identify France, together with her inhabitants, her customs and even her language, says Ferdinand Lot, with the Carlovingian race. They called the French Carlovingians, Carolingi. The German chroniclers called Henry I of France "the King of the Carlovingians"—rex Carolingorum (Annales Altahenses, ad. ann. 1056), to distinguish him from their own German prince.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Finally, to quote Imbart de la Tour, whilst Germany was to find " her national epic in her mythology, her native deities and her Valhalla, France was the first to make of her old Emperor the prototype of her warlike virtues and of her faith." And it was owing to the circulation of the French epics by means of the French bards who sang of Charlemagne, of Rolando and the twelve peers, that the glory of the monarch with the bushy beard finally shone forth across the Rhine.

The renown of the great Emperor of the West not only filled Europe but even crossed the frontiers of the Greek Empire into Asia. Haroun-al-Raschid, Calif of The Dusk. Bagdad, conceived a lively admiration for him. He was the Charlemagne of the East. Under his leadership eight great battles had been fought, huge territories had been conquered, and the boundaries of his Empire extended into Europe and Africa, from Spain to India. He had reduced the Greek Empire to the position of a tributary. Haroun, it is said, preferred the friendship of the King of the Franks to that of all the Kings of the earth, and Charlemagne, profiting by this spirit, succeeded in obtaining from him the right of protecting the Christians in the Holy Land, a privilege which France enjoys to this day. Charlemagne extended his patronage to the churches, the hospitals and the religious establishments of Syria, Egypt and Carthage in Africa.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

When the King of the Franks expressed a wish for an elephant, Haroun-al-Raschid sent him the only one in his possession. It was called Abulabaz, and arrived in 801 in France, where it lived for twelve years, treated with the greatest deference. Haroun sent Charlemagne many other gifts—a tent of many colours woven of the finest linen and a clock which became even more famous than the night clock of Pepin the Short. A description of it has come down to us. The twelve hours of the day were represented by twelve doors, each of which opened at a given moment, whilst metal balls struck a sonorous basin with the number of strokes corresponding to the hour to be marked. It was a chiming clock. At twelve o'clock a miniature rider on horseback appeared at each of the twelve doors, which then closed and the whole process began again.

At the beginning of the ninth century most of Charlemagne's conquests beyond the Pyrenees had fallen again into the hands of the Saracens, and the Emperor entrusted his son Louis, King of Aquitaine with a new campaign. Louis the Pious took Lerida, but was defeated under the walls of Oliva. From this time forward the heir of the great Emperor displayed that listlessness of character which on the battlefield was far better adapted to pious devotions than to military matters. No longer did Charlemagne's lightning marches take the enemy by surprise and put them to flight before an engagement took place, or three army corps in combined manœuvres invade the land of the foe from different points of the compass, seizing whole towns and castles in their grip. After having ravaged the country in vain, Louis recrossed the Alps.

The year 812 saw a fresh rebellion in Aquitaine, which was temporarily smothered, as the preceding one had been, in torrents of blood. "The King [Louis the Pious]," says the Astronomer, "advanced as far as Dax and ordered the instigators of the revolt to be delivered up to him. As his command was not obeyed he invaded their lands and allowed his soldiers to pillage everything."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The downfall of Charlemagne's Empire was not far off.

In Saxony the Emperor had apparently obtained results more in keeping with his desires, but by what means! In 804 the resistance of the country died down owing to fresh trans- portations and deportations among the people. In this year 10,000 fresh families were uprooted from their native soil and transported to the forests of Flanders and Brabant, which they were given the task of clearing.

Then there were the Normans. Charlemagne had boats built which were grouped together in flotillas at the mouths of the rivers and his son Louis was told to take the same precautions in Aquitaine.

In this second half of his reign, after his coronation as Emperor of the West, a great lassitude seems to have overtaken Charlemagne, who in his undertakings against the Greek Empire, the Normans from the north and the Saracens of Spain was far from displaying the same zeal as he had shown even against the Aquitanians, the Lombards and the Saxons. Age had overtaken him and the look of melancholy which the monk of St. Gall says filled his eyes was perhaps the expression of a disillusioned soul. It is true that the deaths of his two eldest sons, Charles and Pepin, which from the point of view of energy of character and military talent were of much greater account than that of their brother Louis would have been, must have been a cruel blow to him.

The partition of 806 between the three brothers had to be undertaken once more. The old Emperor made another will in 811, appointing his son Louis the sole heir of the whole Empire, with the exception of Lombardy, which he kept for his grandson Bernard, the son of Pepin.

Charlemagne's eldest son, named Charles after him, had died at the age of thirty-five without issue. Pepin, King of Italy, who died when he was thirty-three, had left, in addition a trace behind it at the first breeze that brought the men from the north. Never was human dream so quickly dissipated as the Empire of Charlemagne. Never was the subsequent history of an Empire more lamentable than that of the years following the end of his reign. All the catastrophes that had overtaken the world on the fall of Rome were repeated—barbarian invasions, piracy on the high seas, civil wars and the dismemberment of the State.”

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This conclusion is very true. The question is whether it would have been possible to do any better. The Roman Empire, held up as an example by Julian, possessed a formidable scaffolding which centuries had built up and traditions of energetic administration. Charlemagne received a kingdom in a state of chaos, given over to brigandage, as Benjamin Guérard says, “a hotch-potch of races, leaders of bands and people attached to different institutions, customs and overlords.”

All that human labour, energy and good will could do, Charlemagne no doubt accomplished. In order to found a government he possessed but two supports—religious sentiment and the feeling of loyalty. But the leaders of religion, the Bishops, were the first to disorganise everything; and as for loyalty, we all know how fragile a thing this is when it is not maintained by fear of a powerful hand and hopes of fresh benefits to come.

The common traditions of national life had not yet been formulated. How could they possibly have flourished during the exploitation of Rome? How could they ever have come into being under the infant, bloodstained and clammy despotism of the Merovingians?

The prince who at the age of thirty-six was forced to take upon his shoulders the huge burden of his paternal heritage had given proof of solid qualities in the government of the kingdom of Aquitaine, though it is true that the greater part of the credit must be attributed to his father's guidance. The sweetness and at the same time the weakness of his character had, moreover, already been displayed. He possessed four important villas in Aquitaine, great Crown domains which are mentioned in the capitularies. He moved from one to the other to Doubs.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Fontaine (on the borders of Anjou and Poitou) from Doué à Chasseneuil (Agenois) from Chasseneuil to Audiac (Saintonge) then to Ebréuil (Auvergne) and back again to Doué. In each villa there was sufficient for the needs of his household without oppressing the people by the exercise of the right of hospitality, and he was even able to feed his army himself. "And although his men," writes the Astronomer, "did not like this method, the Prince, having regard for the poverty of those who paid this tax, and the cruelty of those who exacted it, preferred to provide for the needs of his men by means of his domains than to cause suffering to his subjects."

On taking up residence in the palace of Aix-la-Chapelle on the 27th of February, 814, Louis busied himself with the task of setting it in order. According to the Astronomer, he turned out "the crowd of women who filled it, with the exception of those required for the royal service." He begged his sisters to go and take up their posts at the head of their Abbeys and tried to drive out their lovers. The latter resisted his efforts and one of them was killed whilst the other had his eyes put out. The Imperial Court was to be conducted like a monastery.

"The Emperor Louis," says Thegan, "was of average height; he had large bright eyes, an open countenance, a long straight nose, a broad chest and wide shoulders and strong arms, and was skilled above all in shooting with the bow and the javelin." With his vigorous body, he was agile and indefatigable, though in this body made for battle there dwelt a timid and disconsolate soul, given over to devotion. His contemporaries called him Louis the Pious and historians Louis the Debonair. He remained for hours prostrate on the stones of the churches muttering prayers and weeping. It had been his desire to become a monk like his great-uncle Carloman, but Charlemagne had prevented him. Nevertheless Carloman always remained his ideal. And he was not mistaken with regard to his true vocation. For he was made for the peaceful life of an obedient monk rather than for the government of a tumultuous State.

Like his father Louis dressed very simply, though he also followed his example in displaying great magnificence on solemn occasions. In such cases he showed himself to his loyal subjects, to ambassadors and foreign princes, in a doublet

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Let us consider the Bishops who provided Charlemagne with his chief instrument of government. One of them, Jonas, Bishop of Orleans, a contemporary of Louis the Pious, writes in connection with the publication of the capitularies: "As soon as the King has published an edict, there is not a man who does not attend open-mouthed or thinks of nught else than obeying the behests of the Prince." Well and good; but the Bishops were to be the first not to obey. They became more and more like the Bishops whom Charles Martel had fought, "tyrants greedy of power," power which they did not hesitate to extend by force of arms. They convoked Assemblies like the King, administered justice in public under the elm in the square. "The clergy of Aquitaine," writes the Astronomer, "applied themselves more to the management of horses, to military evolutions and the exercise of arms than to divine worship."

Like the Counts, the Bishops had been invested with their authority in the cities as delegates of the King, and now, like them, they exercised it as their own personal right. They even usurped the title of Count, when they did not claim it from the King, together with the rights appertaining thereto, the administration of justice from the highest to the lowest jurisdiction, the imposition of taxes, Customs dues, tolls and market charges, and the right of minting money. They maintained small armies at the head of which they paraded with helmets on their heads and built strongholds. The Abbots of the great monasteries, who sometimes ruled over a population of 20,000 to 30,000 souls, did likewise. And the extraordinary fact is that Louis the Pious, who was more religious than nine-tenths of the high dignitaries of his Church, tried to make these higher clergy return to the dress, the practices and the way of life suitable to their estate. As a matter of fact the prelates consented, at a General Assembly held at Aix-la-Chapelle in 817 at the instigation of the King, to publish a magnificent volume in which rules for the use of their monks and country clergy were carefully formulated; but when Louis suggested that they should reform themselves, they found it more expedient to attack him in the exercise of his authority, and finally to subject him to the most terrible humiliation to which a King has ever been exposed.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

"The King must be outside the Church, not in his capacity as a man but as a sovereign!" became the general cry. That same Jonas, Bishop of Orleans, who had waxed so eloquent on the subject of the obedience due to the capitularies, began to speak even more convincingly about the royal abuse of power which had to be stopped. The King was no longer to have the right of appointing Bishops and Abbots as Pepin and Charlemagne had done; the patrimony of the Church, that is to say, the huge domains of the Bishops and Abbots, could no longer be invaded and placed in profane hands, as had been the case under Charles Martel; all ecclesiastical property that had been secularised was to be returned; tithes were to be duly levied and the produce from the fines and confiscations imposed for misdemeanours on the part of the clergy were to be returned to them, whilst fresh donations and immunities were demanded. The shade of Charlemagne must have turned in his gold-encircled vault. Louis the Pious thought he could head the attack made upon him by these helmeted prelates; but the result was disastrous.

In 817, writes Thegan, "the Emperor Louis appointed his son Lothar to succeed him after his death in all the kingdoms which he held from his father and to bear the title of Emperor. On account of this all the other brothers were very angry." These sons were Pepin and Louis, the sons of Louis' marriage with Ermengarde, daughter of Count Ingoramus. It was necessary to appease them, and Louis accordingly gave to Pepin Aquitaine and a part of Burgundy and to Louis Bavaria.

Fustel de Coulanges has described the nature of this partition. Lothar, the eldest, was to be the sole political head, sole Emperor. His juniors were to render him obeisance and to play no part in foreign affairs without his consent. They could not even marry without his authority; but in the territories assigned to each of them, they were allowed full exercise of suzerain rights, they could dispose of benefices, appoint royal officials, and choose Bishops and Abbots.

"And thus," writes Fustel de Coulanges, "all the loyal subjects of the Empire were divided between them, recommending themselves and binding themselves to one or the other by oaths of fealty. Each of the three brothers thus became, not a sovereign in the modern sense of the word, but the chief of loyal vassals."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Meanwhile, Bernard, King of Italy, and nephew of the Emperor Louis, had rebelled against the authority of his uncle and invaded Gaul with his supporters. Louis marched out against the rebels as far as Chalons-sur-Saône, where he captured their leader (December 817). Condemned to death by an Assembly of the Great Ones held at Aix-la-Chapelle, Bernard, together with Reginar, who had been a Count of the Palace, had his eyes burnt out. The Bishops who had taken part in the conspiracy were deposed. Bernard and Reginar died a few days afterwards. Nithard holds Bertmund, a serf of the royal domain, whom Charlemagne had made Count of Lyons, responsible for these cruelties.

But Louis had been frightened, and his timid and retiring nature led him to think it necessary to safeguard himself against any similar outbreaks. He had three brothers, born to Charlemagne by three different wives; they were called Drogo, Hugh and Theodoric. "He was afraid," says Nithard, "that they might imitate Bernard and rebel against him." He therefore made them take the tonsure and shut them up in monasteries, where, nevertheless, he concerned himself about their education and their future. Drogo became Archbishop of Metz, and Hugh, who became Abbot of Saint-Quentin, died in 844 sword in hand, in battle against the Saracens, as did also Archbishop Turpin.

In 818 Louis the Pious lost his wife Ermengarde and wasted no time in marrying again, this time taking to wife Judith, daughter of Count Welf of Bavaria, for whom he had conceived a passionate attachment (819). The beauty of this young woman, her grace and intelligence, are mentioned by all writers of the time.

The soul of Louis the Pious was like a trembling leaf in his body. The rough exterior of a Frankish warrior concealed the temperament of a neurasthenic. His piety savoured of a mysticism which led to extremes of passionless exaltation. He used to hear strange noises at night and natural phenomena filled him with fright. Thunder, lightning and hail were all things of terror for him. "These prodigies," says the Acteonier, "used to terrify the Emperor, and he would order prayer and fasting, and distribute much alms in order to appease the divinity," and to complete his sense of security he took to drink.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

After the tragic death of Bernard, King of Italy, Louis was haunted with remorse, which was a source of fresh libations, more frequent and more abundant than the occasional bumpers due to the agency of hail and thunder. Recent researches have attributed to drunkenness the intellectual and moral lack of balance of the Emperor Louis.

In 822 he summoned a General Assembly at Attigny; Bishops, Abbots and clerics of every rank assembled there in great numbers, as well as the Counts and the Great Ones. Louis went from one to the other, as his father had been accustomed to do, but, unlike his father, he described to everyone the torments of his soul and the remorse which racked him, telling them about the death of Bernard, King of Italy, and the history of his brothers Drogo, Hugh and Theodoric, and other sins that lay heavy on his conscience, as well as reverting to his father and the sins of Charlemagne and those of his grandfather and great-grandfather, Charles Martel, whose place in the tomb had been taken by the devil. The clergy, who had just published their ideas regarding the power of the King in L'Institution Royale by Bishop Jonas of Orleans and La Liberté des Élections by Deacon Florus of Lyons, eagerly seized the opportunity of carrying them into practice and bringing to book this Emperor who wanted to reform them and reduce them to the practice of religious duties.

It did not take long to persuade the unfortunate man that there was only one way of unburdening his soul of the load of crime with which it was bowed down, and that was by public confession, confession as public as the crimes themselves had been. Louis began by releasing from their Abbeys his three brothers Drogo, Hugh and Theodoric and reconciling himself with them. And, in the presence not only of the Bishops and the Great Ones, but before a vast concourse of people, the Emperor made a solemn confession of his "crimes." "His shame was such," writes the Astronomer, "that it seemed as if all the pains and penalties which had been lawfully inflicted upon the guilty were solely the result of his cruelty."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The unfortunate monarch took off his crown with his own hands. In the following year, on the 13th of June, 823, Queen Judith gave birth in Frankfort to a son, who afterwards became Charles the Bald.

Whilst in Gaul the Bishops were concerned with destroying the imperial power, Rome still held it in respect. Eugenius II died in 827. His successor, Valentinus, survived him only a month. Gregory IV was elected in his place, but his consecration was postponed. Rome awaited the approval of the Emperor. "This monarch," says the Astronomer, "having given his consent to the choice of the clergy and the people, Gregory was consecrated Pope."

Louis the Pious took his royal duties seriously to heart. During the lifetime of his father, when he was King of Aquitaine, he already used to set aside three days in the week for hearing cases brought by his subjects, listening to their grievances and pronouncing patriarchal judgment. When he became Emperor his other duties did not leave him so much leisure, and he announced that he would hold audience once a week. "We would have you know," he said in one of his capitularies, "that every week we shall set aside one day to hear cases brought before us in our palace."

But the clergy would not allow him to recover himself. At the Council of Paris, in 829, the Bishops discussed the very nature of the royal power. They even dared to attack the principle of heredity, and to decide that Kings did not hold their titles from their ancestors, but from God alone. They also had the audacity to congratulate Lothair and Louis, the Emperor's two eldest sons, for having rebelled against their father and for having appealed to the episcopal body, after which they congratulated them on having understood that "priests shall judge Kings."

This was the beginning of the great struggle which was destined to last a thousand years, until the end of the ancient régime in France, concerning the origin of the royal power, and which Philip the Fair tried to decide with the rule en cœ "we know."

And indeed in this year 829 Louis the Pious decided upon the action which was destined to unloose such terrible storms.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

At Worms, in the presence of his two sons, Louis and Lothar, he handed over to his youngest son Charles, son of the Empress Judith, the whole of Alemannia, Alsace and Rhoetia, together with part of Burgundy, with the title of Duke. In their fury Lothar and Louis left their father and together with their brother Pepin openly rebelled against him. This was one of the great dramas of history pregnant with vast issues which it is very difficult for us to judge, so different were the circumstances from anything we can imagine to-day.

According to the ideas of the age nobody could deny the Emperor's fourth son his rights to the paternal succession, but the partition was destined to bring the most terrible troubles in its train.

The authority of the monarch was not exercised over territories with fixed boundaries, but over men bound by ties of recommendation and fealty. When Louis the Pious declared his son Charles Duke of Burgundy, he did not mean that he was to reign over the Burgundian territory, but that by means of ties of fealty he was to be suzerain over all the Great Ones, all the Bishops, Abbots, Counts and nobility of the country. These ties were cemented by personal oaths. And this was the reason why the Carlovingian kings had the sons who were to succeed them proclaimed King during their own lifetime, binding their subjects to them by the oath of fealty. We must bear in mind that beneficiaries conferred were temporary, and that they came to an end with the death alike of the giver and the receiver; and the same arrangement applied to the bonds of patronage and fealty. In order to avoid the risk of a terrific upheaval it was necessary for the King to secure the continuation of these bonds in the hands of his heirs, and this as much for the security of his subjects as for the King himself. But what happened when, like Louis the Pious at Worms in 829, anyone modified a partition that had already been made and ratified by thousands of oaths? It meant infinite trouble for the Empire. The Emperor not only modified the territorial arrangement in connection with Pepin, Lothar and Louis to the advantage of the newly-born prince, but he brought confusion into the long chain of faithful subjects which had formed behind each of the former, and thus led to numberless and incalculable complications. One of Lothar's subjects placed by the new partition in Charles the Bald's share, might be his enemy, and yet he was called upon to swear him the oath of fealty and allegiance. It was impossible for a man to swear fealty to two suzerains at once; or again one man might hold two or three benefices from a prince one of which the new partition, by reducing or modifying the latter's share, might place in the hands of another suzerain. And this is precisely the reproach brought by one of the Bishops against Louis the Pious. " You have upset everything, and have made the people murmur against the various oaths you demand of them " And Louis himself, in another public confession which the Bishops extorted from him, accused himself "of having disturbed the peace by demanding contradictory oaths from the people."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But the struggle had been unloosed and reverberated in the furthest corners of the kingdom; and it was destined to be never ending. Once more Fustel de Coulanges gives us an admirable description. As oaths of fealty were sworn to a certain overlord personally, war broke out everywhere. Historians describe the quarrels of Louis' sons with their father, and of the brothers between themselves; but it must be remembered that each of these men had behind him long chains of faithful subjects who encouraged them to fight and whose appetites and desires they were bound to satisfy. This terrible conflict between the members of the imperial family was only the prototype of a countless number of local struggles repeated at various points throughout the kingdom.

The sons who were preparing to march in arms against their father began by attacking the Empress Judith, the mother of the newly-born prince, whose advent had brought so much trouble upon the Empire. Louis had chosen as Chamberlain Bernard, Count of the Spanish March. The Chamberlain, as we have already said, arranged the public finances under the superintendence of the Queen, and his functions brought him into touch with her. This was made a pretext for circulating the sort of rumour it is easy to guess. Pepin, the son of Louis the Pious, gathered together a large army and marched as far as Verbeke. He had with him the Arch-Chaplain, Hillem, and Jesse, Duke of Amiens, together with other great lords. He forced Count

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Bernard to retire at once and sent the Empress Judith into the convent of Sainte Marie de Laon. The rebels went to fetch her from there in order to extract from her the promise that she would persuade the Emperor to adopt the tonsure and put on the robes of a monk, whilst she herself was to take the veil. Judith, on reaching the Emperor, faithfully kept her word; but the latter was very far from allowing himself to be persuaded. He was quite content that his wife should become a nun, but he himself resolutely refused to give up his sceptre and crown. And Judith was obliged to return, as she had promised, to the conspirators, who shut her up in the convent of Sainte Radegund.

Lothar, the Emperor's eldest son, on his arrival from Italy, approved of all that Pepin had done. And Louis the Pious, says the Astronomer in conclusion, had nothing but the title of Emperor left.

Lothar and Pepin held their father in strict surveillance. "They forced him to live with some monks," writes Nithard, "in order to accustom him to the monastic life." Bernard, the High Chamberlain, had sought refuge in Septimania, but Lothar and Louis succeeded in seizing his brother Heribert, and had his eyes put out.

The higher clergy had made common cause with the rebels "who had understood that priests may judge kings." Hilduin henceforward always appeared surrounded by men at arms.

In April 833 Louis the Pious was driven to the cruel necessity of raising an army and marching out against his sons. A meeting took place in the neighbourhood of Colmar, at a spot called the Red Field, "Rothefeld." Pope Gregory had come from Italy to act as mediator. The two armies were facing each other, when the majority of the Emperor's soldiers left him and went over to the camp of his sons. Lothar took his father to Compiègne, after having sent the Empress to Italy.

"Lothar conducted his father to the palace of Compiègne," writes Thegan, "and there in the presence of the Bishops and several other lords he subjected him to a cruel persecution (October 833). The Bishops ordered him to go to a monastery for the rest of his days. He refused. They then chose an impudent man, Ebbon, Archbishop of Rheims (this Ebbon was a man of low birth who owed his advancement to Louis) to torment the unfortunate Emperor" Louis was dragged to the monastery of Saint Medard at Soissons, where before a crowd of people "the Bishops took away the sword from his side, and by order of those who were his servants, clad him in a hair shirt." The unfortunate Emperor was condemned to give a recital of the crimes with which he was charged and of which the prelates had drawn up a formidable list, and then to divest himself of his arms before the assembled people, after which he was shut up in the monastery of Prüm. The field near Colmar, where Louis the Pious had been abandoned and betrayed by his followers, the Red Field, was from that day called the Field of Lies, "Lügensfeld"

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Having made himself master of the Empire, it was not long before Lothar by his arrogance aroused the displeasure of his brother Louis, whom he had reduced to the possession of Germany and Alsace. Louis left Bavaria where he chanced to be and was joined by Pepin, and a reaction took place in favour of the father who had been despoiled, maltreated and outraged by his children. Summoned to set his father at liberty, Lothar refused, saying that he could not be held responsible for the imprisonment of the Emperor, "seeing that it was the result of judgment by the Bishops" (the Astronomer), and seeing moreover, that his brothers Pepin and Louis, who now posed as his champions, had been the first to deliver him up. But Louis the Younger had superior forces at his disposal. Blockaded at Saint Denis, Lothar was obliged to set his father free (February 834). So strong was the reaction in favour of the spurned Emperor that Lothar was obliged in his turn to retire to Italy, after having declared that he would submit himself to his father's commands and in future bow before him. Louis the Pious insisted that the Bishops who had pronounced his fall should reinstate him with their own hands, and at Saint Denis, amid the acclamations of the people, the prelates replaced the purple mantle upon the shoulders of their imperial victim and girt him once more with his sword. Everybody seemed to be overjoyed, but what filled the Emperor with the greatest satisfaction, greater even than his solemn reinstatement, were the celestial phenomena which accompanied it—violent storms had raged unceasingly and the rain had swollen the rivers to such an extent as to make them unnavigable, but the moment the Emperor was reconciled with the Church the elements calmed down in benign concert and the wind fell, it seemed as if all nature were appeased in serene beatitude, as though in harmony with the joy of the people and the happiness of the King.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

On the 2nd of February, at the Assembly of Thionville, the Bishops who had been responsible for the downfall of the Emperor were condemned—Ebon, Archbishop of Rheims, had to resign his episcopacy; Agobard, Archbishop of Lyons, was deposed, and the rest had fled to Italy with Lothar. The re-enthronement took place on the 28th of February, 835, in the Church of St. Stephen at Metz, after which the seven Archbishops delivered seven sermons. Unfortunately intrigues immediately broke out afresh. It was a question as to who should be second in the Empire, that is to say, first, seeing how feeble was the Emperor and how ruined his prestige. Bernard, the Grand Chamberlain, returned to favour and wanted to rule everything. A simple monk, named Gondebaud, who had worked cleverly for the restoration of the Emperor, had similar pretensions; and the two sons who had become loyal, Louis the Younger and Pepin, expected to govern in the name of their father after having obtained, by a fresh partition, an increase in the portion which at the previous division of the kingdom had been allotted to each.

Violence, pillage and depredations of all kinds raged in various parts of the Empire. The Normans made their appearance along the coasts, from whence they penetrated into the heart of the country, burning, murdering and devastating the land, after which they returned laden with booty. The Saracens, on their side, landed on the coasts of the Mediterranean. Louis sent commissioners to various parts of the Empire “to suppress brigandage, authorising them,” says the Astronomer, “in order to drive out the robbers, to demand help from the Counts and the Bishops,” who, however, paid no heed. And then the cursed question of the partitions cropped up again.

Judith considered that the portion allotted to her son Charles was not sufficiently important. And Louis, unable to refuse his wife anything, in 837 assigned to the boy who was to be many others who cannot find in themselves the strength to recover, Louis sought in semi-intoxication an alleviation of a burden too heavy to bear.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But, in many cases, Louis the Pious displayed a majesty of gait and bearing that was quite Shakespearean, reminding us of King Lear, whose old age was also made desolate by his children. And at the end what an impressive nobility he displayed when, with a sudden outburst of energy, he left Aquitaine whose rebellion he had quelled at the head of his faithful supporters, and with his men-at-arms set out for Germany, afflicted with dropsy and a painful asthma which caught his breath, through the snow and the cold, to go and fight one of his own sons and to die in a distant land, on an island in the Main, in the arms of the brother to whom he had once dealt a heavy blow, and at the last moment with his haggard eyes, dilated in the agony of death, filled with the hideous, horrible and terrifying vision of a devil coming in by the window to carry him off.

Louis the Pious, on his deathbed, had sent the golden crown to Lothar, the Emperor designate, and exhorted him not to forget Charles the the protection he had promised Judith, who Bald. would be left a widow, and her son Charles. But

Lothar on the death of his father set covetous eyes upon the whole Empire, since Louis had been reduced to the kingdom of Bavaria and Charles to that of Aquitaine. Louis, surnamed the German, after the States which had been assigned to him, joined forces with his brother Charles and the struggle began.

Each of the two parties tried to win over the greatest possible number of adherents, among them the most powerful; for it was not a question of nationalities. Louis the German, at the head of a strong army, set out to join Charles, who had gone to Aix-la-Chapelle to celebrate the festival of Easter (17th of April, 841). A detail given us by Nithard bears witness to the state of disorganisation into which the whole of France had fallen. "As King Charles was coming out of his bath and was about to dress, messengers arrived from Aquitaine beating the royal crown and the ornaments for divine worship. It was indeed astonishing that such a small band of men were able to traverse such a wide stretch of country infested by brigands given over to pillage."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Nithard, the grandson of Charlemagne, was concerned in the events which followed. He was one of the negotiators of the agreement of Verdun and his account is invaluable.

The two brothers met in Burgundy together with their armies. Louis' forces were exhausted by their long march and weakened by lack of horses. "Nevertheless," writes Nithard, "they were afraid that if Louis abandoned his brother Charles they would hand down a dishonoured name to posterity."

At the beginning of June 841 Louis and Charles with their men were in the district of Chalon-sur-Saône, whilst Lothar was in Auxerre. Louis and Charles once more tried to come to an agreement, but Lothar prolonged the negotiations—he was awaiting contingents from Aquitaine sent by Pepin II.

In Lothar's army there were many Neustrians—the Abbot of Saint Denis and the Count of Paris, "loyal subjects" from the district of Chartres who were bound to the Emperor by oath. The reinforcements from Pepin II had arrived, but a large number of Aquitanians had attached themselves to the fortunes of Charles the Bald. But Lothar and Louis also shared the forces from Germany. Lothar in addition had contingents from Italy.

Each of these faithful subjects had come to defend his own lands, his offices and his tenures and desired their increase at the expense of the conquered. Victory would secure the conqueror a vast quantity of land, and a number of counties and bishoprics for distribution. Nithard says quite clearly, when mentioning the chiefs who were facing each other: "To yield would have meant betraying those who had placed their trust in them." Apart from any idea of race or nationality each man had attached himself to the party to which his interests or his sympathies called him. The more acute among them waited, before taking sides, to ascertain which was the stronger. A battle was fought on the 25th of June, 841, at a place called Fontanet in the neighbourhood of Auxerre, which has not been identified with certainty. The carnage was terrible. Four thousand men were killed. Each side claimed the victory. None the less the battle was a defeat for Lothar, whose pretensions many others who cannot find in themselves the strength to recover, Louis sought in semi-intoxication an alleviation of a burden too heavy to bear.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But, in many cases, Louis the Pious displayed a majesty of gait and bearing that was quite Shakespearean, reminding us of King Lear, whose old age was also made desolate by his children. And at the end what an impressive nobility he displayed when, with a sudden outburst of energy, he left Aquitaine whose rebellion he had quelled at the head of his faithful supporters, and with his men-at-arms set out for Germany, afflicted with dropsy and a painful asthma which caught his breath, through the snow and the cold, to go and fight one of his own sons and to die in a distant land, on an island in the Main, in the arms of the brother to whom he had once dealt a heavy blow, and at the last moment with his haggard eyes, dilated in the agony of death, filled with the hideous, horrible and terrifying vision of a devil coming in by the window to carry him off.

Louis the Pious, on his deathbed, had sent the golden crown to Lothar, the Emperor designate, and exhorted him not to forget Charles the Bald. the protection he had promised Judith, who would be left a widow, and her son Charles. But Lothar on the death of his father set covetous eyes upon the whole Empire, since Louis had been reduced to the kingdom of Bavaria and Charles to that of Aquitaine. Louis, surnamed the German, after the States which had been assigned to him, joined forces with his brother Charles and the struggle began.

Each of the two parties tried to win over the greatest possible number of adherents, among them the most powerful; for it was not a question of nationalities. Louis the German, at the head of a strong army, set out to join Charles, who had gone to Aix-la-Chapelle to celebrate the festival of Easter (17th of April, 841). A detail given us by Nithard bears witness to the state of disorganisation into which the whole of France had fallen. "As King Charles was coming out of his bath and was about to dress, messengers arrived from Aquitaine bearing the royal crown and the ornaments for divine worship. It was indeed astonishing that such a small band of men were able to traverse such a wide stretch of country infested by brigands given over to pillage."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Nithard, the grandson of Charlemagne, was concerned in the events which followed. He was one of the negotiators of the agreement of Verdun and his account is invaluable.

The two brothers met in Burgundy together with their armies. Louis' forces were exhausted by their long march and weakened by lack of horses. "Nevertheless," writes Nithard, "they were afraid that if Louis abandoned his brother Charles they would hand down a dishonoured name to posterity."

At the beginning of June 841 Louis and Charles with their men were in the district of Chalon-sur-Saône, whilst Lothar was in Auxerre. Louis and Charles once more tried to come to an agreement, but Lothar prolonged the negotiations—he was awaiting contingents from Aquitaine sent by Pepin II.

In Lothar's army there were many Neustrians—the Abbot of Saint Denis and the Count of Paris, "loyal subjects" from the district of Chartres who were bound to the Emperor by oath. The reinforcements from Pepin II had arrived, but a large number of Aquitanians had attached themselves to the fortunes of Charles the Bald. But Lothar and Louis also shared the forces from Germany. Lothar in addition had contingents from Italy.

Each of these faithful subjects had come to defend his own lands, his offices and his tenures and desired their increase at the expense of the conquered. Victory would secure the conqueror a vast quantity of land, and a number of counties and bishoprics for distribution. Nithard says quite clearly, when mentioning the chiefs who were facing each other: "To yield would have meant betraying those who had placed their trust in them." Apart from any idea of race or nationality each man had attached himself to the party to which his interests or his sympathies called him. The more acute among them waited, before taking sides, to ascertain which was the stronger. A battle was fought on the 25th of June, 841, at a place called Fontanet in the neighbourhood of Auxerre, which has not been identified with certainty. The carnage was terrible. Four thousand men were killed. Each side claimed the victory. None the less the battle was a defeat for Lothar, whose pretensions matter of fact, precisely the same as the arrangement made by Louis the Pious. His domain included Carlovingian Italy and a strip of about a hundred and fifty miles in breadth stretching from the North Sea to the Alps and the Mediterranean. Louis the German received the countries situated east of the Rhine together with the districts of Spiers, Worms and Mayence on the left bank "by reason of the wine they produced," a curious echo of the old Merovingian partitions which gave to each of the claimants, who were heavy drinkers, in addition to their share in the northern districts, which were good recruiting areas, territories in the southern cantons with their beautiful vineyards.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

This partition, so simple in appearance, became so complicated in detail, that even in the middle of territories assigned to one or other of the brothers isolated patches of land were under the rule of one of the others.

Lothar bemoaned the loss of the imperial suzerainty and the small size of the portion assigned to him, and maintained that it would not provide him with the wherewithal to indemnify those who had attached themselves to his cause. He also deprived of their charges and benefices all those who, once his dependants, had been forced to abandon his side after his defeat at Fontanet.

Charles the Bald, the grandson of Charlemagne, whose birth had brought such great afflictions upon the State, was an interesting figure. He was intelligent, brave, active and unscrupulous, never hesitating to enter into the most solemn alliances, only to break them as soon as his policy demanded it. He was cultured and a good theologian, of which he was very proud. Eric, Bishop of Auxerre, regarded him as a philosopher. And indeed, the intellectual revival which he patronised was far more important than any which appeared under Charlemagne. The theories of Jean Scot on free will are still held in honour and quoted. There were already signs that speculative thought was in process of cultivation and endeavouring to comply with scientific rules.

On the 19th of December, 843, Charles married Ifermentrude, daughter of Eudo, Count of Orleans, and grand-daughter of Adalard, who had played such a significant part at the Court of Charlemagne and afterwards in the reign of Louis the

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Debonair. Charles the Bald, says Nithard, made this marriage in the hope of attracting the greater part of the nation to himself. A curious assertion, for, in that case, what had become of the royal power, seeing that the King was reduced to marrying one of his subjects in order to strengthen by means of his wife's family clients the supreme power invested in himself? Nithard's observation also helps us to understand the importance which a family of "loyal dependants" could acquire in the country by means of the growth of their clientage, and foreshadows the part the Capets were to play.

The partition of Verdun had placed Aquitaine in the portion of Charles the Bald, but the Aquitanians were determined to have a King of their own.

Pepin II, the son of Pepin I, who had been deprived of the kingdom of Aquitaine, collected ever more and more numerous partisans about him. In 844 Charles was obliged to march in arms against him, and set siege to Toulouse. Hugh, Abbot of Saint-Quentin, having brought an army to reinforce him, he thought he could deliver battle in the neighbourhood of Angoulême; but he was defeated. His lieutenants—Ebroin, Bishop of Poitiers, Renier, Bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, Abbot of Ferrières—were taken prisoner. A curious trio of soldiers! The old military episcopate of the days of Charles Martel, which the unfortunate Louis the Pious had tried so hard to reform, had been resuscitated. At all events the poets of the Chanson de Roland who were already writing the trouvères at this period, had their models under their own eyes. By the Treaty of Saint-Benoit-sur-Loire, Charles gave up to Pepin the greater part of the province on his swearing an oath of fealty (June 845).

But anarchy continued to grow. In 845 the Normans reached Paris, entered the town, killing and ravaging, and only retired on payment of a sum of money. In Aquitaine they penetrated as far as Toulouse, and pillaged Saintes and Bordeaux. Aquitaine and Brittany were thenceforward continually at the mercy of their depredations. Charles begged for help from his brother Lothar. In 856 the monks of Saint-Martin of Tours were massacred, Orleans was taken and Paris fell for the second time. In addition to the brigandage of the No lords, the proprietors of the large domains, who were entrusted with the duty of defending the country, also indulged in rapine and set to work to pillage the land.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The situation became so grave that the Abbot of Saint-Bertin and Count Eudo of Chartres were sent as delegates to Louis the German. If he did not come to their help, said the loyal subjects of King Charles, they would seek from the pagans, to the peril of Christendom, the protection no longer afforded them by their own rulers (856).

The Capitulary of Querzy (14th of February, 857), which must not be confused with the Edict of Querzy (877), was promulgated against these brigands housed in palaces. The Counts themselves were threatened with severe chastisement. Whereupon the Great Ones of the kingdom redoubled their supplications at the Court of Louis the German, but it was no longer only against the Normans and the brigands that they asked for help, but against the sovereign who actually aspired to rule them. The German Emperor, busy with a war against the Swabians, had not answered their first appeal.

Amongst the Great Ones who had rebelled against the authority of their King, there is one name worthy of remembrance—that of Robert the Strong.

On the excuse of bringing help, Louis the German led his men at arms forward in 858, sacking everything on his way, and allowing his reiters to commit the worst excesses. He penetrated as far as Orleans, where he received a delegation of lords from Brittany and Aquitaine, but was obliged to return owing to trouble in his own States.

The Edict of Pitres (864, department of the Fore) sheds a curious light upon this society in process of dissolution. The long years of peace which had preceded and which had been favourable to the government of Pepin the Short and Charles the Simple had gradually effaced the enclosures, the sort of shelters and entrenchments inside the frontiers. Charlemagne, all of whose efforts, in his lust for territory, were directed against the foreigner, had rather encouraged this gradual dismantling; and had thus destroyed the facilities for local insurrections and capacity for resistance. This was one of the items in his government which, owing to the egotism of its aims, lacked foresight.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

But what is surprising is that the Edict of Pitres, far from ordering the reparation and reinforcement of the surviving fortresses against the Normans, the Saracens and the other greedy bandits, on the contrary prescribed their complete demolition.

"We desire," said Charles, "that every fortress that has been raised in our kingdom without our permission shall be destroyed." So much more formidable even than the Normans and the Saracens had the native brigands, sometimes very high personages, come to be regarded.

And other clauses in the Edict shed an even more sinister light on the age, more especially Article VI and Article XXXIV.

According to Frankish law, if a free man had to be brought to justice, the sunimons had to be delivered to him in his own domicile. Now many of those leudes, whose houses had been destroyed by the Normans, took to the highways and practised open brigandage, which they found it all the easier to do seeing that, as their houses had been destroyed, they could not be brought to justice. "Having regard to this evil," said King Charles, "we decree that, in such cases, the Count shall send his agent to the spot where the guilty man's house once stood, and that at this spot he shall give him the summons to appear."

Article XXXIV sheds a particularly terrible light upon the society of the day :

"Several of our Counts," said the King, "have consulted us regarding the free men who, under stress of hunger, have sold themselves as slaves. We have asked ourselves, as also our Bishops and other faithful subjects, what it behoves us to do in the matter."

Charles consulted the records of the Salic law and the Capitularies, but could find nothing in connection with such cases. He then had recourse to Holy Writ, where he found that "a man who has delivered himself up into servitude shall be a slave for six years but shall be declared free in the seventh year." And in the laws of the Roman Emperors, "my predecessors," said Charles the Bald, it was stipulated that if free men, under stress of hunger, had sold their children, the latter could regain their liberty on repayment of the purchase money increased by one-fifth. Charles adopted this latter arrangement may well be imagined, further complicated as it was by the incursions of the Normans; for the pirates had returned and installed themselves on the Loire. In the Annals of St Bertin we read "The Bishops and other lords who live across the Seine showed great diligence in raising from every side the tribute they were called upon to pay to the Normans who remained on the Seine and its neighbourhood." Perhaps this was what the Normans, in their treaty with Charles the Bald, meant by "carrying on trade" (877).

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The famous Edict of Quierzy-sur-Oise (877) was one of the last acts of Charles the Bald. It has been regarded as the constitutional charter of feudalism. It recognised the heredity of offices. The King undertook, "in case one of his Counts should come to die leaving a son of tender years," to put the child in possession of the "honours," that is to say, the offices, of his father. This constituted a fresh and serious weakening of the royal authority and deprived it of its chief weapon of power. But, as Mons Pfister has justly observed, this same principle of heredity was also to be regarded by the kings as a factor for order and stability. "Every vacancy in an office or a benefice gave birth to jealousy and quarrels; when once the principle of heredity was admitted, the transmission took place without any upheaval."

It has been very rightly observed that the Edict of Quierzy did not inaugurate a new régime. The social order of a State cannot be changed by a stroke of the pen in edicts or capitularies. The decision of Charles the Bald merely confirmed a condition of things which already existed and which had arisen from force of circumstances.

After sixty-five years of life, the magnificent Western Empire, founded with so much pomp and ceremony by Charlemagne, was the most derelict object in the general state of ruin. On the death of the Emperor Louis II on the 12th of August, 875, it really seemed that the Empire had ceased to exist, but the Papacy clung to it desperately as though it were a plank which might still bring it to port out of the storm.

Pope Adrian II, the predecessor of John VIII, had once meditated crowning Charles the Bald Emperor of the West. On the death of Louis II, John VIII revived the idea, in the hope that the King of France, as heir of Charlemagne, would protect him against the Saracens, who were becoming ever more and more audacious along the coasts of Italy, just as Charlemagne had protected his predecessors against the Lombards. Charles the Bald, at the head of the most trusty of his subjects, crossed the Alps and made a brilliant entry into the Papal city, where he was crowned Emperor of the West on the 25th of December, 875, Christmas Day, like his grandfather Charlemagne. Whereupon, to complete the similarity, he went to Pavia, the old capital of Lombardy, where from the hands of the Archbishop of Milau he received the Crown of Italy (31st of January, 876). He then returned to France.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

But these were but empty glories. The dazzling memory of Charlemagne was a dangerous mirage. The Battle of Andernaeh (8th of October, 876) in which the forces of Charles the Bald were defeated by the Thuringians and the Saxons under Louis the Younger, the son of Louis the German, sounded a rude awakening. Nevertheless the Pope continued to address desperate appeals to the Emperor Charles the Bald. Charles, the heir of Charlemagne, Emperor of the West and King of Italy, could not turn a deaf ear to them. And it was at this juncture that he drew up the Edict of Quierzy in order to ensure the fidelity, or at least the tranquillity, of the Great Ones during his absence. Charles met the Sovereign Pontiff at Vereelli. A number of Italian lords declared themselves in favour of Carloman, the eldest son of Louis the German. Here were already the Guelphs against the Ghibelins. In France, many great personages, Hugh the Abbot, Boso, Count of Auvergne, openly rebelled, and Charles was forced to return. He died on his way back, at Avrieux, at the foot of Mount Cenis, on the 6th of October, 877.

Mons. Pfister very justly concludes that the task imposed upon Charles the Bald was too much for any human being. "It is impossible for any man to arrest the dissolution of society." It would have been interesting to see how Charlemagne would have dealt with it. Charles the Bald himself most truly remarked : "The invasions of the infidels (the Normans) and the evil designs of those who are Christian only in name have may well be imagined, further complicated as it was by the incursions of the Normans; for the pirates had returned and installed themselves on the Loire. In the Annals of St. Bertin we read : "The Bishops and other lords who live across the Seine showed great diligence in raising from every side the tribute they were called upon to pay to the Normans who remained on the Seine and its neighbourhood." Perhaps this was what the Normans, in their treaty with Charles the Bald, meant by "carrying on trade" (877).

THE EARLIEST TIMES

The famous Edict of Quierzy-sur-Oise (877) was one of the last acts of Charles the Bald. It has been regarded as the constitutional charter of feudalism. It recognised the heredity of offices. The King undertook, "in case one of his Counts should come to die leaving a son of tender years," to put the child in possession of the "honours," that is to say, the offices, of his father. This constituted a fresh and serious weakening of the royal authority and deprived it of its chief weapon of power. But, as Mons. Pfister has justly observed, this same principle of heredity was also to be regarded by the kings as a factor for order and stability. "Every vacancy in an office or a benefice gave birth to jealousy and quarrels; when once the principle of heredity was admitted, the transmission took place without any upheaval."

It has been very rightly observed that the Edict of Quierzy did not inaugurate a new régime. The social order of a State cannot be changed by a stroke of the pen in edicts or capitularies. The decision of Charles the Bald merely confirmed a condition of things which already existed and which had arisen from force of circumstances.

After sixty-five years of life, the magnificent Western Empire, founded with so much pomp and ceremony by Charlemagne, was the most derelict object in the general state of ruin. On the death of the Emperor Louis II on the 12th of August, 876, it really seemed that the Empire had ceased to exist; but the Papacy clung to it desperately as though it were a plank which might still bring it to port out of the storm.

Pope Adrian II, the predecessor of John VIII, had once meditated crowning Charles the Bald Emperor of the West. On the death of Louis II, John VIII revived the idea, in 877.

hope that the King of France, as heir of Charlemagne, would protect him against the Saracens, who were becoming ever more and more audacious along the coasts of Italy, just as Charlemagne had protected his predecessors against the Lombards. Charles the Bald, at the head of the most trusty of his subjects, crossed the Alps and made a brilliant entry into the Papal city, where he was crowned Emperor of the West on the 25th of December, 875, Christmas Day, like his grandfather Charlemagne. Whereupon, to complete the similarity, he went to Pavia, the old capital of Lombardy, where from the hands of the Archbishop of Milan he received the Crown of Italy (31st of January, 876). He then returned to France.

But these were but empty glories. The dazzling memory of Charlemagne was a dangerous mirage. The Battle of Andernach (8th of October, 876) in which the forces of Charles the Bald were defeated by the Thuringians and the Saxons under Louis the Younger, the son of Louis the German, sounded a rude awakening. Nevertheless the Pope continued to address desperate appeals to the Emperor Charles the Bald. Charles, the heir of Charlemagne, Emperor of the West and King of Italy, could not turn a deaf ear to them. And it was at this juncture that he drew up the Edict of Quierzy in order to ensure the fidelity, or at least the tranquillity, of the Great Ones during his absence. Charles met the Sovereign Pontiff at Vercelli. A number of Italian lords declared themselves in favour of Carloman, the eldest son of Louis the German. Here were already the Guelphs against the Ghibelins. In France, many great personages, Hugh the Abbot, Boso, Count of Auvergne, openly rebelled, and Charles was forced to return. He died on his way back, at Avrieux, at the foot of Mount Cenis, on the 6th of October, 877.

Mons. Pfister very justly concludes that the task imposed upon Charles the Bald was too much for any human being. "It is impossible for any man to arrest the dissolution of society." It would have been interesting to see how Charlemagne would have dealt with it. Charles the Bald himself most truly remarked : "The invasions of the infidels (the Normans) and the evil designs of those who are Christian only in name have destroyed the power of the capitularies drawn up for the maintenance of order."

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Charles the Bald was succeeded by his only surviving son, Lous the Stammerer, who was crowned at Compiegne on the The Wreck 8th of December, 877. He was a man of thirty, and the He had considerable difficulty in securing the Rescue. succession, for the Great Ones of the kingdom had insisted upon an election, which was no longer the simple formality it had been in previous reigns. The "faithful" insisted upon the uttermost farthing for their adhesion, the laity receiving fresh lands and the Bishops the confirmation of their offices and immunities. The Crown became more and more impoverished. Witikind, one of the chroniclers of the day, wrote the following characteristic description of the state of society, "After Lous the Pious the affairs of the Franks fell into disorder, whilst those of the Saxons became more flourishing from day to day."

But this disorder of the Franks, who can now be called the French, was the benign disorder which gives birth to active energies and brings freedom from the fetters of the past. The sap was mounting upwards. In the midst of the tumult the country was co-ordinating its forces and preparing the elements of a civilisation rooted in its own soil. It was the disorder which was burgeoning so magnificently in Gaul at the time when Cæsar appeared and by which he profited in order to spread a stifling and barren culture in a country heroically engaged in a glorious destiny. The temporary prosperity of the Saxons, who can now be called the Germans, was founded on the unity of life and social co-ordination under the hand of one chief, whether King or Emperor, which for the time being endowed them with the power of attacking and dominating their neighbours across the Rhine. But the generous and vigorous tumult, in the midst of which so much creative energy was exercising among the French, was not long before it resolved itself into the most marvellous harvest of social, economic, artistic and literary masterpieces that the world has ever known and the fruits of which were to be spread among those same Saxons, those same Germans, to take root among them and germinate into fresh harvests. "After the reign of Charles the Bald," writes Fustel de Coulanges, "the Kings no longer took any part in the administration. They no longer drew up capitularies or legislative acts; justice was no more in their hands. Their reign was spent in receiving oaths of fealty . . ." sworn by lords and prelates with the intention of keeping them according to their own pleasure. The King no longer levied taxes.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The lands composing the kingdom of Charles the Bald constituted, as a matter of fact, those parts of the Carlovingian Empire in which the social elements pregnant with a new order of society displayed the greatest activity. More especially in the districts watered by the upper reaches of the Seine, by the Marne and the Oise, there was being forged, in the general disorder and turbulence of the age, around the generating cell of all civilisation, the family, that formidable organisation which was to be known as mediaeval feudalism, from which the modern world is derived.

Under the ægis of an impotent monarchy, notwithstanding the efforts of an intelligent King like Charles the Bald, the movement made its appearance through its very resistance to the royal authority, in the midst of the state of brigandage which was everywhere increasing. This state of brigandage was due not only to the Normans, the Vikings, who were spreading throughout central France, but also to the Saracens, who were landing on the coasts of the Mediterranean and travelling up the valley of the Rhone, and lastly to the Hungarians, who had come from Asia and invaded Lorraine and Champagne, and reappeared more than once to carry out their depredations; whilst bands of marauders, noble lords, and landed proprietors whose estates had been ravaged and their houses pillaged—the "vagrants" of the historical documents—lived on rapine and highway robbery. "Robbery and burglary became the custom," writes Hinemar, "and everybody was a brigand. Brigandage was no longer regarded as a crime."

The greatest lords, Counts charged with the maintenance of order, prelates, Abbots and even Kings—like Pepin II, the dethroned King of Aquitaine—joined forces with the bandits from the north, attacking domains, castles and villas, and making trophies of their booty. One may imagine the massacre of the poor, peasants with their throats cut, bodies heaped up in his own esteem, a friend of justice and of peace and impressive in his dignity of manner. In the company of Robert the Strong he and the Great Ones had opposed the royal authority, after which he had rallied to the cause of Louis the Stammerer and became his chief supporter.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Louis the Stammerer died on the 11th of April, 879, after a reign of barely two years, leaving the throne to his two sons, Louis III and Carloman. Louis III took Neustria, Carloman Burgundy and Aquitaine. But the legitimacy of the two princes was immediately disputed, the late King having repudiated their mother Ansgarda. And the whole of one faction in the State, at the head of which was Goslin, Abbot of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, offered the Crown to Louis the Younger, the son of Louis the German. Louis advanced as far as Lorraine, where the Great Ones, the majority of whom were faithful to the cause of Louis III and Carloman, found themselves obliged to return to the King of Germany, in order to put an end to his pretensions, that part of Lorraine which Charles the Bald had recovered. And thus various groups of feudalists who, in order to protect themselves against destruction and anarchy, had formed hierarchies of "faithful subjects," began to raise their heads threateningly against the royal power. In the lower basin of the Rhone, Boso, son of Theodoric I, Count of Autun, had made himself a veritable kingdom, including the districts of Lyons, Vienne and Provence. An assembly of Bishops, held at Montaillé in Vienne, proclaimed him King. Carloman marched out and laid siege to Vienne, in which Ermengarde, the wife of Boso, was shut up. But the Great Ones recalled Carloman, begging him to come to their help against the Normans. Carloman left a body of troops before Vienne, which only capitulated after a siege of two years.

This prolonged siege of Vienne by Carloman seems also to have inspired the bards, who named the hero Charlemagne instead of Carloman, in whom nobody would have felt any interest; for in the epic cycles all the heats from which they drew their inspiration used to be attributed to one hero. In this same year, 882, the Normans set fire to the towns of Cologne and Treves, Saint Lambert of Liège, the Abbey of Prüm, the palace of Aix-la-Chapelle, all the monasteries of Tongres, Arras and Cambrai and some of those in the diocese of Rheims. The Bishop of Metz, who had advanced against them, had been killed in battle and his men put to flight.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

The Normans had reached Laon, an impregnable town on a fortified hill, and, ravaging the neighbourhood, proceeded to lay siege to Rheims. Archbishop Hincmar took flight with the relics of Saint Remi. Carloman surprised a strong band of pirates who were returning from Rheims laden with booty, and hurled some into the Aisne, the others making good their escape (882).

On the 22nd of February Carloman held an Assembly at Compiègne. In the capitulary he then published there is a clause of the greatest importance : “ If a man is caught acting the brigand, he of whom he is the vassal shall conduct him into our presence in order that we may punish the guilty man; otherwise the lord shall pay the penalty for the crime in his stead.”

It was not only the pirates who practised brigandage—Normans, Saracens, Hungarians and the landed nobility; the vassals of the latter made a regular habit of it. The King renounced the exercise of his judicial rights, placing the burden of them upon his “ faithful subjects.” The lord was obliged to seize the guilty vassal and bring him before the royal tribunal, on pain of being punished in his stead if he did not. In short, the lord having been made responsible for the behaviour of his men, the bonds between them were still further strengthened.

In March 884 there was another Assembly of the Great Ones, this time at Vernon. Carloman took further measures to suppress brigandage, pronouncing severe penalties against any who were found guilty of it; he also tried to restore order in his palace by following the instructions of Hincmar. But his efforts were all in vain. He was reduced to paying 12,000 pounds in gold to the Norman marauders in return for a promise that they would leave the country and remain away for twelve years. This was the last act of the young prince who, in such a short reign, gave many proofs of decision and far-sightedness. Carloman died through a hunting accident on the 12th of December, 884. His brother Louis III had preceded him to the tomb two years previously.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

that the equality of their claims and of their power increased the divisions between them and that there was no one candidate who so far surpassed the others that they were willing to submit themselves to his rule."

The Great Ones of the Kingdom, Bishops, Counts and lords, elected Count Eudo, the son of Robert the Strong. The Annals of Saint Bertin pass the following verdict upon him :

" He surpassed all the others in his tallness of stature, his handsome countenance, and by his strength of mind and body. Moreover, he governed the kingdom with all the application that could be desired and defended it with indefatigable vigour against the perpetual incursions of the Normans."

And thus we find ourselves once again in France! And just consider that beautiful and altogether French way of winning the throne, the epic struggles of the father to defend his native soil, struggles in which, after twenty victories, he found a glorious death, with his face ever towards the foe; and the son, equally brave and strong, equally valiant, becomes in mind and body worthy of his father's memory during that fine siege of Paris. Immediately after his coronation, on the 29th of February, 888, we find him fighting against the Normans at Montfaucon in Argonne. He rallied his soldiers together to the sound of the horn, like Rolando at Ronceveaux, "with so powerful a blast that only the mouth of a king could produce its like." We were right in comparing him with Rolando at Ronceveaux.

Good God, we are indeed far from the hideous brigandage of Clovis, far also from the crimes and the underhand policy of Pepin the Short, far even from the methods whereby Charlemagne succeeded in maintaining himself as the sole power in the land and extending his dominions.

The Empire of Charles the Fat broke up into six States—France, Lorraine, Germany, Burgundy, Provence and Italy. The eastern frontiers of France became once more what they had been under the partition of Verdun. Between the Rhine, the Scheldt and the Meuse was formed the kingdom of Lotharingia (Lorraine) separating France from the German Empire.

The task of government was unfortunately exceedingly difficult for Eudo. The incursions of the Vikings were repeated at various points in the country. Eudo exhausted himself in combating them and found himself in his turn reduced to treating with them. And at this juncture, a party among the nobles, tired of a strong government, at the instigation of Fulk, Archbishop of Rheims, acclaimed and had consecrated King of France, in the basilica of Saint Remi, Charles the Simple, the son of Louis the Stammerer. And thus the kingdom in the midst of all its troubles was again divided into factions which unloosed all the horrors of civil war, the faction of Charles the Simple, the Carlovingian, guided by the Archbishop of Rheims, and that of King Eudo, directed by the Archbishop of Sens. Finally Eudo, being an intelligent man and placing the interests of his country above his own—a new departure in the royal annals—came to an understanding with his adversaries, and gave up to Charles the Simple part of his States together with Laon (the Mont Loon of the ballads) as capital. This was the period in which the epics were born, which provides a further reason for the great part played by the town of Laon in the lays which glorified Charlemagne and his "geste," meaning his family.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

As King Eudo had no children, he himself recommended his officers and the Great Ones of the kingdom to crown Charles the Simple by common accord after his death. He died on the 1st of January, 898. Robert, his brother, was the first to support the election of the Carlovingian, and in return King Charles left him in possession of all the "honours" which he had held from his brother, the counties and the abbeys. And thus Robert became the richest and most influential of all the Great Ones and bore the title of Duke of France.

The reign of Charles the Simple is marked by one important act which had far-reaching results—the Treaty of Saint-Clair-sur-Epte, concluded with the Viking Rollo. Rollo had made himself master of a large part of the province which was afterwards known as Normandy, and had seized Rouen. Richard Le Justicier, Duke of Burgundy, having inflicted a complete defeat upon him in the neighbourhood of Chartres, Charles the Simple thought it was a favourable moment for coming to terms with the vanquished Viking. By ^{the} Sain - ir-sur-Epte (911) Rollo was assigned to on the right bank of the Seine from Epte as far as the sea. The only condition that Charles made was that Rollo should be baptised together with all his men.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

But this was no novelty. We have already seen how one of the predecessors of Charles the Simple acted in the same way and on the same conditions towards the Normans whom he established in the region of Angers.

We know the results of this settlement. The country of the Normans was organised by Rollo, and after him by William Longsword, and soon acquired a prosperity worthy of admiration. The Normans of Normandy preserved their love of navigation and their skill at it and became the glorious sailors who have played such an illustrious part in the annals of France. Rollo and his companions married the women of the country. They abandoned their own language and spoke "Latin," as the chroniclers of the eleventh century call it, but which meant French. It was through the Normans that the great French civilisation of the Middle Ages was spread throughout England, where it shone with its most original splendour. It was in Norman French that the Chanson de Roland was preserved; not that it was composed in Normandy—it first saw the light in the Île de France—but because the Normans adopted it as a sort of national song. It was to the measures of Roland à Roncerœux that, under the command of Duke William, they conquered England.

This establishment of the Normans in the part of France assigned to them also determined the particular character of the social and political state of Normandy in the future—in the first place, her pacification and her more rapid settlement, which must not be attributed to the genius of Rollo or of William Longsword his successor, but to the circumstances in which they were placed. They arrived in the country as recognised victors, as rulers of the land which they could set to work to organise with a high hand. Astonishment has been expressed at the rapidity with which they completed their task. The unfortunate province of Normandy had been so terribly ravaged in every sense of the word that it was like virgin soil upon which it was easy to mark out and build upon. Whilst the rest of France was organised through thousands and thousands of small local groups, and local authorities, isolated in the midst of the upheavals and the anarchy, and unable to avoid entering into struggles one against the other, in a process of slow, tumultuous and agitated, but extraordinarily vital and fertile formation—Normandy was organised by means of one sovereign mind with disciplined helpers at his disposal. It might be compared to a park designed and planted by an expert hand—this was Normandy; whilst on the other hand there was the magnificent tumult, the disordered burgeoning of the woods, in a struggle for existence in which the strongest alone could survive or those who, like the plants beneath the protecting ramification of the great oaks, had placed themselves under the protection of the strongest—these were the various provinces of France.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

And this peculiar constitution of Normandy, due to her early history, had numerous and far-reaching consequences. Viollet-le-Duc has made a curious but exceedingly profound observation—as is his wont—on the subject of the arrangement of the strongholds of Normandy, and of the rest of France. In Normandy, he writes, each of the points of defence, each of these strongholds formed part of a co-ordinated whole, each had its place assigned to it in the general defence of the country—the result of the organisation imposed by a conquering and guiding hand; whilst in the rest of France each dungeon was built for itself and for the seigniorial domain surrounding it, without any connection with the neighbouring strongholds, in hostility to which it seems, on the contrary, to have been constructed.

In the famous provincial charters which were to be granted to the provinces of France at the beginning of the fourteenth century by the son of Philip the Fair, these same differences may be observed. The Norman charter had a different character from the others, and alone of them all was able to be put into practice.

Whilst the Duchy of Normandy, with the character of a free monarchy, was in process of formation, other independent States came into being in various parts of France, but by means of a totally different movement, a movement from below; they were formed by the co-ordination of the living forces of the nation which had taken root in the soil. William the Pious,

THE EARLIEST TIMES

Marquis of Auvergne, created a powerful State for himself in the centre of Gaul. He was master of Auvergne, of the counties of Velay and Bourges. The same process took place in Gascony. Some idea can be formed of this local co-ordination of States, from which mediæval France was to emerge, by the creation of the Duchy of Burgundy in the hands of Richard le Justicier. Traditions had remained particularly strong in Burgundy. We have already drawn attention to them in Celtic days, before Caesar, and they had not changed. The Burgundians formed a kingdom apart even when they were united with other provinces under the authority of a common King. Richard won his supremacy, like the Robertinians, through his valour against the pirates, and it must be admitted that the Norman invasions, by throwing the State into a general condition of disorganisation, had strengthened the small local groups, which in the midst of anarchy had centred about the gemal core of the family, and obliged them to organise and work together in order to resist the common foe. And thus the creation of the national existence was accelerated in the Île de France and in Burgundy and other parts of the country.

The victories of Richard le Justicier over the Normans were numerous and ended in their defeat in 911 under Viking Rollo near Chartres. The deliverance of Chartres, which resulted in the Treaty of Saint-Clair-sur-Epte, had extremely important results, just as the energy and of Paris had had before it. D.

now received the honourable title of Justicier. And here once more we find one of the essential conditions of the work of co-ordinating the primitive cells existing in the organisation of the family. It was impossible to continue for ever fighting one against the other. It was necessary to live, to work, to cultivate the land, to reap the harvest and to carry on some trade. Let this at least a comparative condition of peace was necessary and the existence of some authority capable of settling the differences between individuals by means of some pronouncement of equity and able to curb the violence of local wars. Richard was a soldier, like Rollo the Norman; but he was also, like him, a peacemaker: hence the title of honour conferred upon him. "The importance of the grouping by families."

THE CARLOVINGIANS

writes Jacques Flach, "was proved in Burgundy by the constructive work of the Duchy. Richard of Burgundy also belonged to one of those great dynasties who were offering their services to the people in place of the Frankish King, when the unity of the Empire was shattered and they became the rulers of local nationalities. Through the prestige of his geste (family) Richard was able to found a royal dynasty, which is the essential basis for national cohesion and co-ordination."

A similar process took place in all the provinces, though everywhere the work of social co-ordination started from below and worked upwards, except in the case of Normandy, where it began from the top.

Outside and in addition to the provincial dynasties, the person of the King, at the head of the State, was no less of a necessity. Just as each of these individual States, which we may call provinces, would have fallen to pieces without the personality of the Duke, Count or Marquis, who was the key-stone of the arch, so the kingdom itself could not have maintained its unity without the kingly office. We have seen how the power of the King gradually declined. Under the last of the Carolingians it seemed deprived of all means of activity, but nevertheless it still had some strength because it was a necessity. Maurice Prou has very rightly observed that, in the course of the ninth century the personality of the King in France assumed an ever more and more religious character, it became "theocratic" and its sacerdotal side was an essential feature of it. The King, who no longer exercised any power in war, was endowed by the people with supernatural prestige; whereby, to quote Maurice Prou once more, he preserved his supremacy. The King might be a child or a weak man, without energy or strength of character; he might have no domains, or even offices and benefices to be distributed whereby to entice faithful subjects to his cause or keep those he already had; but he was, nevertheless, the King, a sacred person placed high above the heads of all in order to maintain the requisite unity of the country.

The struggle for the possession of Lorraine still continued between the two parts of the old Carolingian. Charles the Simple would not allow the ri-to lapse. In 912, he was elected King of the country, and in the following year we find him master of Strasbourg. The episcopal coins bear his name. "In Lorraine no less than in Alsace," remarks Jacques Flach, "the rights of the Kings of France were never forgotten or abandoned in the tenth and eleventh centuries, any more than they were in later times," although it may be true that the German sovereigns, profiting by the disputes between the last of the Carolingians and the Robertinians, thought that they might with impunity usurp the territories naturally and historically attached to the kingdom of their neighbours.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

In the kingdom of France, the Great Ones, Dukes, Counts, Bishops and Abbots and landed proprietors, on whom the power of the King depended, gave their support sometimes to the Carolingians, sometimes to the Robertinians, according as their interests, the consolidation or extension of their power, their "honours" and their property directed them. They were moved by no other motives. The idea of race or of nationality never occurred to any of them. Charles the Simple was ruling with a certain intelligence, energy and activity, when, in 920, those who had placed him on the throne came and informed him "that they would no longer obey him if he did not change his ways," meaning if he did not allow them more liberty. And indeed, in 922, his "faithful subjects presented themselves before him, and throwing wisps of straw on the ground, announced that they would no longer acknowledge him as their overlord. Cutting themselves off from him, they left him isolated." And returning to the Robertinians they elected King, on the 29th of June, 922, the second son of Robert the Strong, with the title of Robert I.

Charles the Simple, raising an army among his faithful in Lorraine, marched against his adversaries. A battle took place near Soissons on the 14th of June, 923. Robert I was killed in action, but the arrival of his son Hugh, assisted by Herbert Count of Vermandois, gave the final victory into the hands of the Robertinians. It might have been expected that the son of the late monarch would be proclaimed King, but the choice of the Great Ones fell upon Raoul, Duke of Burgundy. We have already pointed out the importance the Duchy had assumed in the time of Richard le Justicier, and Duke Raoul found himself in addition at the head of the most important abbeys of the district—Saint-Germain d'Auxerre and Saint-Colombe de Scns.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

But it must not be imagined that these great local sovereigns, like the rulers of Burgundy, Flanders, Vermandois, Auvergne, Poitou, Aquitaine, Gascony and Brittany, were free from disturbances and quarrels. On the contrary, they were the victims of internal dissensions, just like the Kingdom of France and the Île de France round which the nation was supposed to rally. The same fights and struggles were repeated a hundred-fold on a lower scale, each of the social, religious or secular authorities, overlords or landed proprietors, founders of dynasties or families, defending or developing his place in the sun with the object of maintaining his existence or increasing his prosperity. Just as the Kings lost their power over the Great Ones, so the latter found their authority over their subordinates weakened. An unexpected but very characteristic proof of this may be found in the independence which the country clergy acquired with regard to their ecclesiastical superiors. The Bishop lost his authority over the parishes, which passed into the hands of the proprietor of the domain upon which was built the church administered by the priest and in which the latter's parishioners lived—a proof, among many others, of the increase in the power of the inferior nobility and of the rupture in the relations between the Bishops and the country clergy. Nevertheless the maintenance of divine service had to be secured. The simplest way seemed to be for the priest to marry and transmit his cure to his son, just as the rural tenant transmitted the land he cultivated, a solution which did not mean any weakening in religious tradition, but was the natural outcome of circumstances which it was impossible to control. From the organisation and co-ordination of the social cells within the framework of the landed estates, the life and salvation of the people and of the Church herself in France was destined to emerge.

"France," as Mons. Pfister very rightly observes, "was organising herself for local life."

For we must not confound dissolution with anarchy. A body decomposing by the wayside, melting away and soon to be preserved in the grottoes of Périgord, incomparable proofs of a nobility of which France may indeed be proud.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After this we saw the formation of the fine civilisation of Gaul, the foster mother of Roman civilisation, with its exploitation of the mines, its ironworks, its enrichment of the soil by means of manure drawn from the land, its agricultural implements, wagons, furniture, clothes, enamels and even soap for that cleanliness of the body which makes the dignity of man. What does France not owe to her ancestors, the Gauls of the first century before our era? What did the Romans themselves not owe to her?

During the fertile period of their independence the Gauls had kings of epic glory, Ambigatus, King of the Bituriges, who made his arms resound as far as the East and founded kingdoms there. They had Homeric bards who celebrated the glories of the royal lines and that of the gods. Their clergy taught the immortality of the soul and tried to probe the secrets of nature.

What fair destinies were opening up for Gaul when there appeared a man of prey, a spirit of evil who, unfortunately, was also a man of genius, and by a series of terrible crimes Julius Cæsar extended his sway over Gaul, and Rome imprisoned the vanquished in the meshes of her administrative net.

But Rome was about to enter the period of her decline, and Gaul, from whom she drew renewed strength and vitality, became the pitiful victim of this decadence. Rome prevented Gaul from remoulding her national life on lines similar to those which France was to lay down for herself in the ninth and tenth centuries. It is true that under the rule of Rome an end was made to the struggles which gave birth to new social forces, conducted under the leadership of chieftains similar to those who, in the war for independence, displayed all their energies and greatness of soul. But how did Rome replace them? She gave to Gaul only a brittle and fragile peace, which was succeeded by centuries of ruination and barbarism.

In the midst of this tame mediocrity, with its mournful cairnes, through the shadows dyed crimson with the blood of the arenas, there shone forth all at once a great light—Christianity. Behold the glorious life giving force, of which the people of Gaul, in the face of their conquerors, laid hold in order to animate it with their own spirit and endow it with their own generous splendour ! But the frontiers were crossed by bands of savages, the Germans, who returned again and again from the third to the sixth century, repeating their acts of pillage, devastation and the murder of women and children in the most brutal way, spreading the most lamentable havoc and desolation everywhere —annals of blood and ruin for which Rome alone was responsible. Rome had arrested the development of Gaul, she had put a stop to her national organisation, and prevented her from securing her own self-defence. Rome had shouldered these charges only to end in miserable failure, incapable as she was of performing the duty she had undertaken, which proved a burden too heavy for her to bear ; and it was the nation she had conquered in order to “civilise” it by means of exploitation that had to pay the price.

THE CARLOVINGIANS

Towards the end of the fifth century one of these marauding bands, as repulsive as the rest of them, the Franks, forming an alliance with a section of the clergy who were threatening the progress of a rival sect, extended their sway over the country by means of bloodshed. The Roman administration was replaced by the Merovingian monarchy. Fustel de Coulanges has remarked, in connection with the rule of these “regenerators,” that the history of the world has no more repugnant spectacle to offer than the series of crimes, treasons, acts of cowardice and knavery which the Merovingians heaped up from one reign to the next and of which Gregory of Tours has drawn a vivid picture.

Nevertheless France continued to live on, to work, to suffer and to love, falling back upon her own resources, and suffering these perennial robber bands, commanded by kings, in the way a strong and healthy body suffers the presence of destructive parasites.

The Carlovingians succeeded the Merovingians. They were better people, no doubt, and had in their ranks men of high intelligence and strong will who swiftly built up an Empire of formidable appearance. They understood the resources with which the element of religion could provide them and with its help completed the mechanism essential for their organisation. Nevertheless the latter remained entirely superficial and had no preserved in the grottoes of Périgord, incomparable proofs of a nobility of which France may indeed be proud.

THE EARLIEST TIMES

After this we saw the formation of the fine civilisation of Gaul, the foster-mother of Roman civilisation, with its exploitation of the mines, its ironworks, its enrichment of the soil by means of manure drawn from the land, its agricultural implements, wagons, furniture, clothes, enamels and even soap for that cleanliness of the body which makes the dignity of man. What does France not owe to her ancestors, the Gauls of the first century before our era? What did the Romans themselves not owe to her?

During the fertile period of their independence the Gauls had kings of epic glory, Ambigatus, King of the Bituriges, who made his arms resound as far as the East and founded kingdoms there. They had Homeric bards who celebrated the glories of the royal lines and that of the gods. Their clergy taught the immortality of the soul and tried to probe the secrets of nature.

What fair destinies were opening up for Gaul when there appeared a man of prey, a spirit of evil who, unfortunately, was also a man of genius, and by a series of terrible crimes Julius Cæsar extended his sway over Gaul, and Rome unprisoned the vanquished in the meshes of her administrative net.

But Rome was about to enter the period of her decline, and Gaul, from whom she drew renewed strength and vitality, became the pitiful victim of this decadence. Rome prevented Gaul from remoulding her national life on lines similar to those which France was to lay down for herself in the ninth and tenth centuries. It is true that under the rule of Rome an end was made to the struggles which gave birth to new social forces, conducted under the leadership of chieftains similar to those who, in the war for independence, displayed all their energies and greatness of soul. But how did Rome replace them? She gave to Gaul only a brittle and fragile peace, which was succeeded by centuries of ruination and barbarism.

In the midst of this tame mediocrity, with its mournful cameos, through the shadows dyed crimson with the blood of the arenas, there shone forth all at once a great light—Christianity. Behold the glorious life-giving force, of which the people of Gaul, in the face of their conquerors, laid hold in order to animate

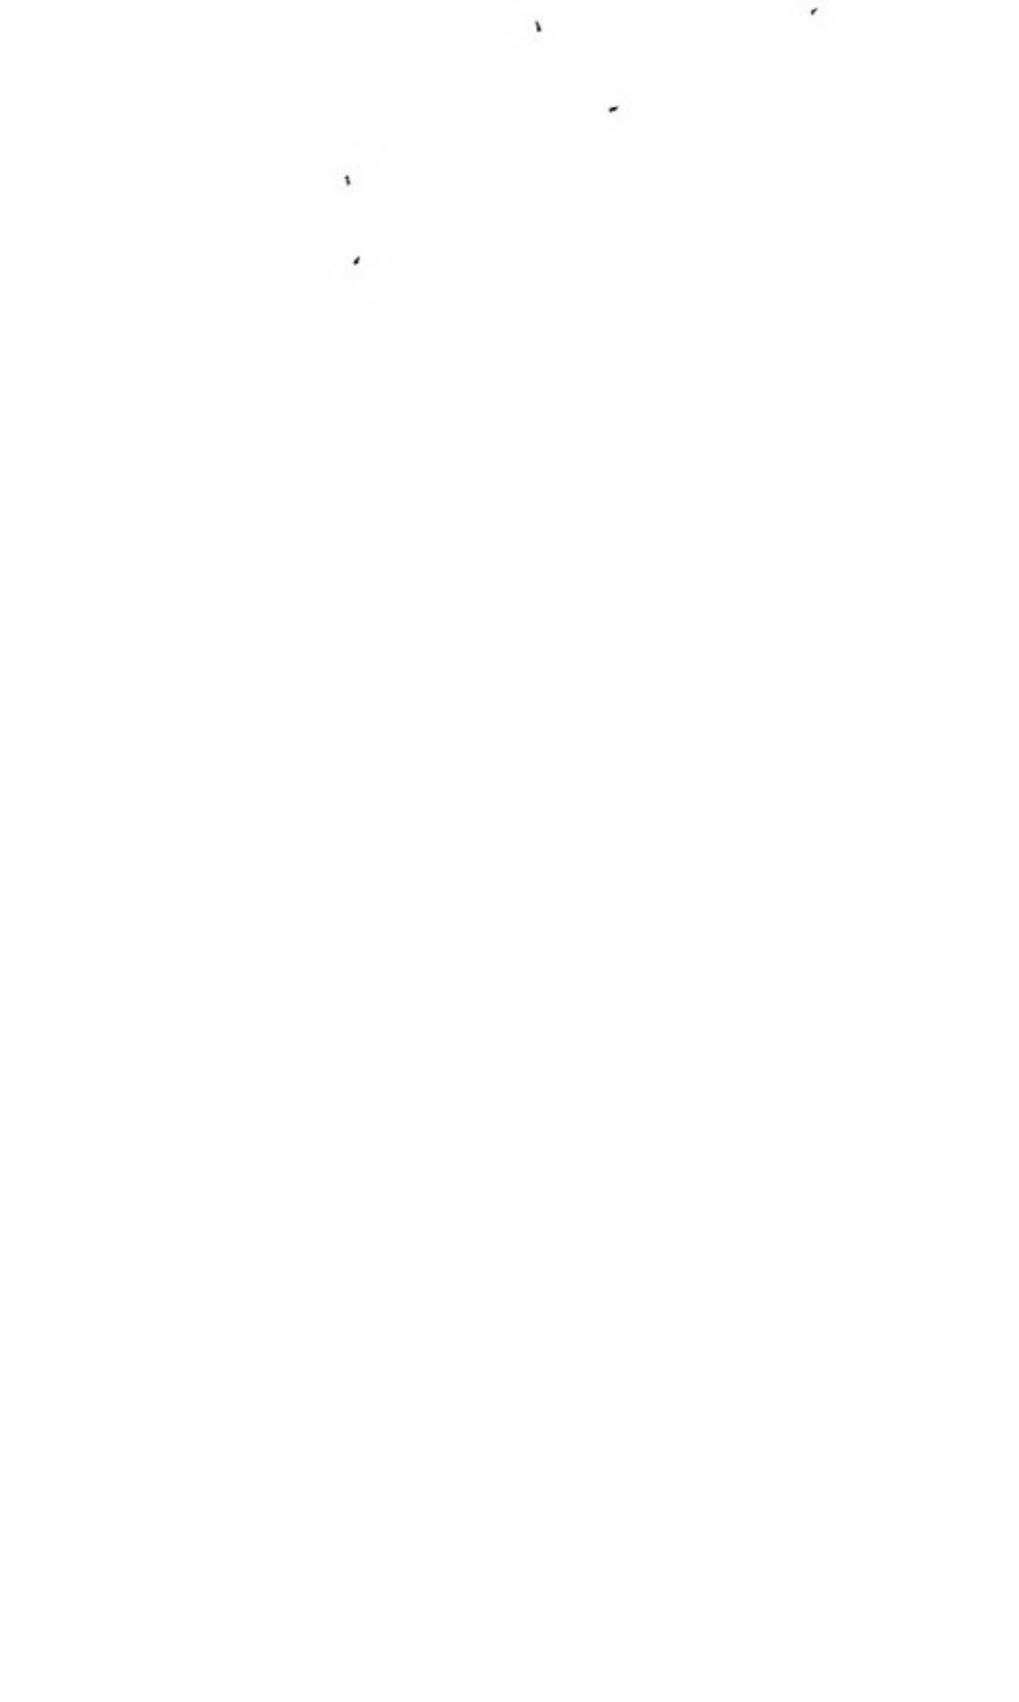

THE CARLOVINGIANS

it with their own spirit and endow it with their own generous splendour ! But the frontiers were crossed by bands of savages, the Germans, who returned again and again from the third to the sixth century, repeating their acts of pillage, devastation and the murder of women and children in the most brutal way, spreading the most lamentable havoc and desolation everywhere —annals of blood and ruin for which Rome alone was responsible. Rome had arrested the development of Gaul, she had put a stop to her national organisation, and prevented her from securing her own self-defence. Rome had shouldered these charges only to end in miserable failure, incapable as she was of performing the duty she had undertaken, which proved a burden too heavy for her to bear ; and it was the nation she had conquered in order to "civilise" it by means of exploitation that had to pay the price.

Towards the end of the fifth century one of these marauding bands, as repulsive as the rest of them, the Franks, forming an alliance with a section of the clergy who were threatening the progress of a rival sect, extended their sway over the country by means of bloodshed. The Roman administration was replaced by the Merovingian monarchy. Fustel de Coulanges has remarked, in connection with the rule of these "regenerators," that the history of the world has no more repugnant spectacle to offer than the series of crimes, treasons, acts of cowardice and knavery which the Merovingians heaped up from one reign to the next and of which Gregory of Tours has drawn a vivid picture.

Nevertheless France continued to live on, to work, to suffer and to love, falling back upon her own resources, and suffering these perennial robber bands, commanded by kings, in the way a strong and healthy body suffers the presence of destructive parasites.

The Carlovingians succeeded the Merovingians. They were better people, no doubt, and had in their ranks men of high intelligence and strong will who swiftly built up an Empire of formidable appearance. They understood the resources with which the element of religion could provide them and with its help completed the mechanism essential for their organisation. Nevertheless the latter remained entirely superficial and had no

INDEX

ACHEULEAN opeoh, the, 7
 Adalrie, independent attitude of, 358
 Aedui, the, hegemony of, 56
 Aetius, his defeat of the Franks, 212; of the Burgundians, 213; of the Huns, 217; murder of, 218
 Alans, the, description of, 211
 Alarie, threatened by Clovis, 241; defeated by Clovis, 247
 Alcinanni, the, appearance of, 179
 Alcsia, siego of, 117
 Alexander Severus, murder of, 138
 Allobroges, the, description of, 58
 Alphabet, the Greek, used by the Gauls, 52
 Ambigatus, his conquests, 48; his kingdom, 55
 Ambiorix, his defeat of Sabinus, 98; his struggle against Cæsar, 99, 100; reappcarance of, 112, 118
 Arianism, riso of, 200
 Arians, the, compared with the Catholics, 239
 Arioistus, his empire, 85; defeated by Cæsar, 87
 Arius, desription of, 201
 Arles, siego of, 245
 Arminius, defcated by Germanicus, 177
 Arnulf, teacher of Dagobert, 274; ancestor of Charlemagne, 300
 Art, in prehistoric times, 10, 11
 Arverni, the, their premature unification of Gaul, 45; hegemony of, 56
 Attila, desription of, 216
 Augustus, his division of Gaul, 125; worship of, 128; festival of, 138, 139
 Aurignacian opeoh, the, 9
 Ausonius, his lack of originality, 159; tutor of Gratian, 192; made consul, 193; artifciality of, 193
 Austrasia, origin of, 258
 Austrehilda, has her doctors killed, 259
 Bagaudæ, the, rustic rebels, 123; revolt of, 184; in the kingdom of Syagrius, 228
 Bards, the, 38

Basilica, desription of Gallo-Roman, 145; desription of Christian, 173
 Belisarius remonstrates with Theodorie, 256
 Benefices, the, desription of, 309–311
 Bernard, rebellion of, against Louis the Pious, 386
 Bertha, Big-footed, mother of Charlemagne, 324; her marriage plans for her sons, 324
 Bibraete, desription of, 55
 Bishops, the, governed the cities, 195; their power, 198; hostility of the monks to, 199; most powerful of the aristocracy, 278; rulo of, 278–288; corruption in election of, 284
 Blandine, martyrdom of, 169
 Bordeaux, schools of, 158, 192; walls of, 186
 Bourges, desription of, 54; siego of, 109
 Brunchaut, desription of, 264; her regencies, 265, 268; execution of, 269
 Burgundians, the, appearance of, 179; settled in Gaul, 213
 Cæsar, Julius, his horsc, 3; his desription of the Ardennes, 16; his invasion of Gaul, 86; excellenee of his armies, 90; his campaign against the Belgeæ, 92; against the Veneti, 93; against the Rhineland peoples, 94; against Britain, 95; his struggles against Ambiorix, 99, 100; his discipline, 102; his tacties against Vereingetorix, 109; defeat of, at Gergovia, 110, 111
 Cæsarius, succours Arian prisoners, 245
 Camulogenus, death of, 112
 Capitularies, definition of, 335
 Caracalla, his extension of the right of Roman citizenship, 137
 Carloman, rule of, 312; his abdication, 313; his life as a monk, 314; re-appearance of, 318; his death, 319
 Carloman, brother of Charlemagne, his

INDEX

- accession, 323, his enmity to Charlemagne, 324; death of, 326
 Carloman, son of Louis the Stammerer, 13
 e, 217
 —, 7
 Celtic language, the, importance of, 131
 Celts, the, 25, conquests of Gaul by, 29, their language, 29, their religion 30. their name
 7
 —, 1
 Charles Martel, elected by the Austrasians, 302, his victories, 303, defeats the Saracens, 304, 305, honoured by Gregory III, 305;
 322; accession of, 323, his enmity to Carloman, 324, his controversy with Stephen III, 325, his marriage to Desideria, 325, a great soldier, 325, war against Hunald, 326, repudiates Desideria and marries Hildegarde, 326, his wars against the Saxons, 327, 336-340, his war against the Lombards, 327-330, proclaimed King of the Lombards, 330, his mild rule of Lombardy, 331; popularity of, 334, his defeat at Lutzbach, 337, his massacre of Saxons, 338, an ecclesiastical monarch, 341, his treatment of the Bishops, 341, 342, combated heresy, 342, his capitularies, 343, his discipline of the clergy, 344; presented with the keys of St. Peter, 345, simplicity of his government, 347, renewed campaign against the Saxons, 361; his victory over the Franks, 361; succours Leo III, 364, visits Rome, 364, presides over trial of Leo III, 365, proclaimed Emperor, 365, his plans to marry Irene, 366, his wives and sons, 369, his daughters, 370, his studies, 371, description of, 371; at table, 372; his dress, 373, analysis of his rule, 374; protector of Christians in the East, 376, death of his sons, 377; death of, 378
 Charles the Bald, birth of, 388; made Duke of Burgundy, 389; his territories increased, 394; his struggle for power, 397; defeats Lothar, 397, his covenant with Louis the German, 398; description of, 400, his marriage, 400; his defeat near Angoulême, 401; orders destruction of fortresses, 403, his legislation, 403; crowned King of Lorraine, 405, crowned Emperor, 407; death of, 407
 —, consecrated King, 419, elected King of Lorraine, 424; defeats the Robertinians, 424
 131, 132; persecution of, under Marcus Aurelius, 136, 168; advent of, 168, its socialistic teaching, 169, a revolutionary movement, 197
 City, definition of, 126
 Civilians, revolt of, 135
 Claudius, granted Roman citizenship lavishly, 133
 Clotar, murders his nephews and son, 251, his wives, 255; unites Gaul, 254
 Clotar II, murders Fredegonda, 269
 Cloth trade in Gaul, 153
 Clotilda, retires to Tours as a widow, 225, 247, her marriage to Clovis, 230, her choice for her grandson, 251
 Clovis, accession of, 214; his conquest of Gaul, 226, his attack on Soissons, 228, his war against the Thuringians, 229; his marriage, 231; his first slogan against the Alemanni, 231, his vow and baptism, 232, becomes a Catholic, 233, his war w. t. the Burgundians, 237, defeats them, 244, his conquest of A. p. t. a. 244, his thanksgiving to St. Martin, 244

INDEX

- honoured with title of patrician and consul, 246; death of, 247; his murders, 248; his sons and grandsons, 249
- Commius, revolt of, 112, 113
- Commodus, disasters to Roman Empire under, 136; growth of Gallic Church under, 171
- Concilium, the, 139
- Counts, the, duties of, 349, 352; their renunciation, 351
- Cultivators, the, description of, 205
- Curiæ, the Gallic, 143
- Dagobert, made King of Austrasia, 270; his wives, 271; his conquests, 273; his administration of justice, 274; death of, 275
- Decurion, office of, 141; made compulsory, 142
- Denis, martyrdom of, 172
- Dcsiderius, marries his daughter to Charlemagne, 324; his war against Charlemagne, 327-330
- Deutheria, her treatment of her daughter, 257
- Dijon, description of, 237
- Diviciacus, his intrigues with Rome, 85
- Dolmens, 18
- Domains, the, description of, 202
- Druids, the, their cult of the mistletoe, 31; their punishments, 34; their practice of human sacrifice, 35; their oral tradition, 36; ignorant of writing, 37; as judges, 37, 38; their power of excommunication, 38; disappeared with rise of Christianity, 130
- Drusus, Governor of Gaul, 128
- Dumnorix, revolt of, 97, 98
- Duumvirs, the, 143, 144
- Eloysis, adviser of Dagobert, 274; his skill as a goldsmith, 274
- Enamelling, among the Celts, 56
- Eudo, King of France, 418; his struggles against the Normans, 418; death of, 419
- Franks, the, appearance of, 178; installed in Gaul, 212; description of, 219
- Fredegonda, marries Chilperic, 262; death of her sons, 263; her crimes, 263; her hatred of her daughter, 264; her benevolence to the poor, 264; her murder of Praetextatus, 266; death of 268
- Freedmen, the, position of, in Gaul, 207
- French language, the, origin of, 131-133
- French nation, the, composition of, 28
- Galba, proclaimed Emperor, 134
- Gaul, States of, 54
- Gauls, the, description of, 28, 40, 41; their contempt of death, 36; tribal organisation of, 42-45; character of, 49, 50; their houses, 60; their food, 61; their towns, 61, 62; invented soap, 62; their glasswork, 63; their agricultural implements, 63; their roads, 64; their coins, 65; their bread and ale, 65; their clothes, 66; their love of adornment, 67; tenure of property under, 68; feudalism under, 69-72; their primitive method of warfare, 88-90
- General Assemblies, the, description of, 331-336
- Gergovia, siege of, 110
- Germans, the, description of, 174; invasions of, 173; defeated by Marius, 176; and Germanicus, 176; repulsed by Marcus Aurelius, 177; great invasions by, in 175-276, 180; defeated by Probus, 181; entrusted with defence of the Empire, 182; settled in Gaul, 184; great invasions of, 210
- Gilles, Count, death of, 224
- Gondebaud, defeats Clovis, 238
- Gontran, description of, 258
- Goths, the, settled in Gaul, 214
- Greek, played important part in education, 159
- Greeks, the, their admiration of the Celts, 28
- Gregory of Tours, compared with Ausonius, 193
- Grutatus, death of, 117; meaning of his name, 118
- Hadrian, his admiration of the Gauls, 136
- Hiatus, the, 12, 13
- Hugh, Abbot, adviser of Louis the Stammerer, 411
- Huns, the, description defeated by Aetius, 21
—, 362

INDEX

- Iherians, the, 24
Immunity, the right of, 287, strengthened royal authority, 293, 294
Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons, 170, martyrdom of, 171
Irene, the Empress, Charlemagne's deference for, 346, her cruelty, 363, Charlemagne's plan to marry, 366
- Judith, wife of Louis the Pious, 386, gives birth to Charles the Bald, 388, attacked by her stepsons, 390, unprisoned in a convent, 391
- Julian, his residence in Paris, 155, defeat of Alemanni by, 182, Governor of Gaul, 191, defeat of Germans by, 191, proclaimed Emperor by the Germans, 211
- Justinian, his letter to Theodebert, 255
- Lako dwellers, the, 14
- Leo III, a suppliant before Charlemagne, 364, tried by Charlemagne, 365, proclaims Charlemagne Emperor, 365
- Leudes, the, description of, 211
- Ligurians, the, 16, as lake-dwellers, 17, description of, 19, their religion, 20, practised human sacrifice 21, predominant in the French nation, 28
- Limes, the, 186
- Lombards, Charlemagne's war against the, 327-330
- Lorraine, description of, 404
- Louis the German, joins Charles the " " " 307
- Lo
- tion of, 304
his struggle with the Bishops, 384, his struggle with the clergy, 385, divides his Empire between his sons, 385, rebellion of Bernard against, 386, marries Judith, 386, his abasement, 387, rebellion of his sons against, 389, disastrous results of his partitions, 390, makes war on his sons, 391, disarmed and shut up in a monastery, 392, his reinstatement, 392, his reenthronement, 393, barbarian invasions under, 393, death of, 395
- Louis the Sluggard, son of Lothar, 427
- Louis the Stammerer, accession of, 468, his death, 412
- Lueterus, the lieutenant of Vereungtonix, 106
- Luernus, King of the Arverni, 57
- Lyons, foundation of, 127, battle of, 137, the martyrs of, 169
- Magdalenian epoch, the, 9-12, artistic achievements of, 9-12
- Magi, the, 39
- Marcus Aurelius, his reign a period of decadence, 136, persecutes the Christians, 136, 168, defeats the Germans, 176
- Marquises, the, duties of, 350
- Marseilles, foundation of, 51, her trade, 53, her fleet, 53, university of, 159
- Martin, elected Bishop of Tours, 194, 283
- Mayors of the Palace, the, origin of the office, 269-270, 280 of, 273, appointed by the nobles, 273
- Megalithic age, the, 13
- Megalithic monuments, 18-21
- Meroveus, gave his name to a dynasty, 221
- Migrations, the, 22
- Missionaries, the, their duties, 344, 345
- Montmartre, origin of, 173
- Mousterian epoch, the, 7
- Napoleon, crowns himself, 343
- Narm's massacre the Franks, 207
- Neolithic age, the, 13
- Neustria, origin of, 253
- Nîmes, arenas of, 140
- Normans the, appearance of, 302; enter Paris, 401, first attempt at settlement in Gaul, 413; their depredations, 412, bribed by Charlemagne, 413, their return, 414; besiege Paris, 415, description of, 416; established in Normandy, 419
- Papacy, the, anomalous position of, 363

INDEX

- Paris, arenas of, 148; potters of, 150; town of, 153; the Emperor Julian in, 155; martyrs of, 172; made the capital by Julian, 191; importance of, 257; siege of, by the Normans, 414
 Parisii, the, description of, 58
 Pavia, siege of, 328-330
 Pepin de Landen, Mayor of the Palace, 277
 Pepin d'Heristal, Mayor of the Palace, 301; his power, 302
 Pepin the Hunchback, 325; conspiracy of, 360
 Pepin the Short, rule of, 312; proclaimed King, 316; consecrated by Stephen II, 317; defeats the Lombards, 320; his wars against Waifar, 322; death of, 337
 Pitres, Edict of, 402, 403
 Procurator, the, his office, 140
 Quierzy, Edict of, 406
 Raoul, elected King of France, 424
 Remi, the, description of, 58
 Rhetoric, schools of, 158
 Richard le Justicier, defeats Rollo, 419, 422; creates Duchy of Burgundy, 422
 Robert I, elected King of France, 424
 Robert the Strong, his rebellion, 402; his exploits, 410; the ancestor of the Kings of France, 411
 Rollo, defeated by Richard le Justicier, 419; baptism of, 420
 Roman citizenship, granted to Gauls, 133
 Romans, the, short stature of, 28; invade Gaul, 76, 77; exploitation of Gaul by, 78-80
 Rome, captured by the Gauls, 47
 Roncesvalles, battle of, 355
 Saint Cloud, origin of, 252
 Saint John, Festival of, 35
 Saracens, their invasions, 304; defeat Crooked-Nosed William, 357
 Saxons, the, wars of Charlemagne against, 327, 336-240; Charlemagne's savage edict against, 339; rebellion of, 361
 Seigneur, the, as head of a small State, 292; enjoyed right of immunity, 293
 Senator, the, of the fourth century, 203
 Septimus Séverus, his policy of decentralisation, 137
 Sequani, the, the Empire of, 57
 Sheriffs, institution of, 351
 Sluggard Kings, the, 276
 Solutrian epoch, the, 9
 Soul, the immortality of, 36
 Stephen II, consecrates Pepin the Short, 310; and turns to him for help against the Lombards, 318
 Stephen III, opposes plans of Big-footed Bertha, 324
 Strasbourg, the oaths of, 398
 Syagrius, the kingdom of, 223; his restricted authority, 227; defeated by Clovis, 228; death of, 229
 Theatres, description of, 147
 Theodebert, 250, 251; description of, 254; his treachery, 255; his death, 256
 Theodoric or Thierry, son of Clovis, description of, 250
 Theodoric the Great, his letter to Clovis, 233, 234; pleads with Clovis, 240; his letter to Gondobaud, 242; his letter to the Arlesians, 245; his benevolent rule, 246
 Thermæ, the, description of, 146
 Tourassian epoch, the, 12
 Towns, description of the Gallic, 143-152
 Trees, sacred, 31, 32
 Troglodytes, the, 7-9
 Universities, the Gallic, 156
 Veneti, the, description of, 59
 Vereingotorix, description of, 101; his difficulties, 102, 103; outbreak of his rebellion, 103; his allies, 104; his failure in poliorcetics, 108; surrender of, 117
 Verdun, partition of, 399
 Vergobret, the, 451
 Vespasian, Gauls peaceful under, 134
 Villa, the Gallo-Roman, 161-164; the Merovingian, 288-293; the Carolingian, 347
 Villages, the Gallic, 160; decay of, in the seventh century, 291
 Vindex, insurrection of, 134

INDEX

- | | |
|--|--|
| Waifar, his struggle against Pepin, | victory at Sunthal, 338; reconciled
322 to Charlemagne, 339 |
| William, Crooked-Nosed, defeated by | Women, in Gaul, 49 |
| the Saracens, 357; his victory in | Zacharias, his reply to Pepin the Short, |
| Spain, 359 | 315 |
| Wittikind, the Saxon patriot, 327; his | |

